MARY HAWORTH

"Drop Counterfeit Friends" Is Wholesome Advice

Dear Mary Haworth: My husband and I are 25 and 23, respectively. Our firstborn is four years old and recently we had a second child, which necessitated and hastened our move from an apartment building into a house of our own (our first).

Most of our friends in the apartment building were somewhat older couples, though they too have young children. We always enjoyed the association and felt we had much in common with them.

However, when we bought our house they reacted as if we had committed some horrible crime. At first I thought I was imagining this, but eventually my husband and I recognized that they resented our enterprise, even though we didn't flaunt it in any way.

We still see these people but I miss the formerly enjoyable relationship we shared. Nowadays our visits with them are strained, as they show displeasure at our being the first to "make the big move."

My husband is hurt and says "their kind of friendship we don't need." Could you please help us find some feasible way of restoring the old friendly footing? Thank you. C.P.

Dear C.P.: If it is indeed a fact that your former apartment neighbors began to give you a hard time socially, in envious spirit, to "cut you down to size" or deflate your suspected sense of achievement in moving into a house of your own, then I agree wholeheartedly with your husband that "their kind of friendship" isn't worth pursuing.

And my advice is, don't linger apologetically outside the closed door of their peevish attitude. Rather, take their ungraciousness of your cue (or as the summons of Providence) to face forward hopefully along all fronts of social endeavor, in your new situation.

"All things work together for good, for those who love God and are called according to His purpose," the Scriptures tell us. And it well may be that God's plan for you (which waits your cooperation to bring it into being) includes the potential of many wonderful friendships yet to be made farther along the road of life.

So, instead of wasting time and effort, backtracking to the old neighborhood, searching for gold that never existed, that was counterfeit from the start, square off to the future. Act on the challenge to forge worthwhile new friendships based on such durable shared interests as church membership, work with your children's schools (beginning at kindergarten level), community helpfulness and the like.

Dear Mary Haworth: I rather suspect that people who find government work boring would find any work boring.

I happen to know a maiden lady who has been in government service a good many years, and who often works on Sundays and holidays without necessity, because she likes it.

Of course she is higher than a clerk, though she occupies no exalted position. Sincerely, D.V.

Dear D.V.: In general, the theory is that unless one is in top command, and fully responsible in the final analysis for the success or failure of a big undertaking, it is not praiseworthy, nor good business, to work "on Sundays and holidays, without necessity."

That sort of overtime is evidence not so much of love-of-work as of a lopsided life, lacking in suitable psychological, social and interpersonal-relationships ballast. It might be better for such a worker to branch out into more variegated "people" — activities in off-duty hours. M.H.

ELLEN'S DIARY

The Wind's Eerie Whistle Is Punctuated With Rain

"It's a Fall night — this. What a rain!" James, husband of ours, offers, down in the kitchen, through it, from the stables, work of day done. It washes the panes in a crystal run at the moment, and beats down on the roof.

"I don't like the sound of the wind" Mack says, preparing to return to the house across the lane. "It has an eerie whistle to it. Hear it!" And we think: "The rain and the night together, came down, and the wind came after..."

A troubled Fall night it is, one of rain and wind.

"I do hope" James remarks settling back in the old armchair, "we shan't get any calls to the barn tonight. It's good to be indoors by the fire on a night like this."

Odd times we leaf back over the doings of the months past. As we did this afternoon in an idle spell For no reason at all unless, it was to catch glimpses of days gone. "The stream runs full today - carrying off the winter" we read. And saw the spring commencing to weave its magic up and down the valley. "The lilacs' scent is on the air tonight" — and we can hear in fancy the frogs' pipings, and the farmers by day at the cropping, and see the cattle - kind once more on the pasture We closed the pages, and threading a needle, took up a piece of mending. Yet remembered the haying came by way of dewy mornings and beautiful sunsets... and wild roses along a lane. In mellowed sunshine and shortened days, the grain - harvest came. So the seasons come and go. And all too soon we must change the dreamy loveliness of Autumn for the wearied fields and the damp of the Fall.

A night of rain and wind — one of November's, we have now. But thoughts run ahead. By this, we shall have entered December's paths. Left November's lanes behind, and moved nearer toward the Christmas Season. It is that, which makes the month beloved.

"I like December, because it's then that Santa Claus comes" Peter smiled today

"But there's more than that to it, Peter nodded. "More to Christmas than just Santa Claus."

"What?" he queried.

"Well for one thing, there's the Christmas concert — don't forget that!" It is truly a number of things — tangible and intangible, linked... woven together. And December brings it.

"And how do the foals do?" a letter of this morning inquired. The summer has been good to them They have grown well. Today Sister Millie's (still nameless) was separated from her mother, and given her own stall in the stable. The Sarah mare's filly too must suffer a parting one of these times.

And the rain continues to fall. The wind is high, and out of doors the night is more or less dreary But December will set the bright of Christmas stars, high over the farmlands.

Until tomorrow — Diary — Good - night.....
