Thousands Still Visit Gravesite Of Kennedy

By HUGH MULLIGAN

ARLINGTON, Va. (AP) — In the year since John F. Kennedy was buried on Arlington's Hill of Heroes, he has never been alone.

Day or night, winter or summer, someone always comes.

On summer Sundays, as many as 50,000 come, lining the walks for hours as far back as Memorial Bridge.

On fine fall afternoons, when leaves rustle across the lawn of the old Curtis-Lee mansions up on the hill and squirrels go bounding over the squat military headstones, the parking lot is filled with chartered buses and the grave site carpeted with wreaths and flowers brought by church and fraternal groups.

Regardless of the weather, seldom fewer than 3,000 mourners visit the grave on any day. On weekends, never fewer than 8,000.

Military police on duty at the grave can't recall a night when a car didn't stop on the roadway below with an evening visitor.

NEEDLEPOINT MEMENTO

Sometimes, after the cemetery has closed for the night, Mrs. Kennedy comes, a tragic figure kneeling by the graves of her husband and two of their children. The last time she came, the sergeant who let her in handed her one of the dozens of mementoes left on the grave that day—a piece of needlepoint, set in a cheap frame, anonymously but tenderly executed with a line from Tennyson:

"So sad, so fresh, the days that are no more."

Hardly a day goes by without someone leading a poem, quoted or home made. Hardly an hour goes by without someone leaving a medal, rosary or a religious picture.

Every 15 minutes crack infantry troops escort groups up the hill to place another wreath. By evening, there are always 25 or 30 more.

People come from all over the country, all over the world, to pay their respects. In the last 12 months, 7,600,000 mourners have filed past the grave.

On a typical recent weekend 30,000 came out.

All day long they shuffled over the canvas covered walkways to the gravesite. Cameras clicked. Nuns fingered their beads. Mothers pushed baby carriages. Old folks, mostly, cried a little. And a 10-year-old boy left a poem of his own composition:

"Whatever happened on the terrible day
When President Kennedy died?
The United States and the whole world too
Just cried and moaned and sighed. . ."

Opening lead—jack of hearts.

Dear Mr. Becker: I have read a lot of bridge books in my day, and thousands of bridge columns besides, and the one thing that impresses itself on me is that most of these writers don't know what they're talking about.

They advocate bids and plays that I simply can't fathom. They have a peculiar idea, for instance, that it is proper to lead from weakness towards strength, but it is my experience that it is better to lead from strength towards weakness.

For example, I played this hand the other day and held the South cards. I was in four spades. I suppose most players would say it is impossible to make this contract, since the apparent losers are two spades, a heart, two diamonds and a club, but I will tell you frankly that this is due to an obsession on their part on how a hand should be played.

West led the jack of hearts and I went up with the ace. In line with my theory I played the four of hearts, next and was not surprised to win the trick with the ten. Some people might say the reason East did not go up with the king was that he was afraid I had a singleton, but I personally think it was because he was not familiar with my advanced style of play.

I then led the three of clubs, a play you will not find in any book, and West, utterly confused by my superior technique, let me win the trick with the jack.

Then once again I demonstrated the beauty of my theory when I led the five of spades at this point. East naturally followed low and my seven forced the ace.

There is no use going on with the rest of the play, because, as you can see, my king of spades later caught the queen and I wound up losing a spade and two diamonds and made four spades. I hope you see what I mean. Sincerely yours, Eustace Ignatz.
