"The football player who wants to be in his boots will probably kick off in some game."

"I am, old fellow, let's go ahead and get it."

"Dear Marie, her marriage was a great disappointment to her."

"Did you win in yesterday's foot ball game?"

The Old Order Changes

By DAVID LYALL

"Four; we are only three now; my brother George was killed, you know, at Ypres. There is only Tom now, and my youngest sister, Bee. I am the eldest of the family."

The Canon inclined a sympathetic head. He had heard of that deep sorrow in the first weeks he had come to Mardocks, a broken man himself, fearful that he had lost his grip on life.

"Tell me, where will you live at Gorham? It is a village, or what?"
"Yes, something like Mardocks; and Gorham Lacy, which my father has bought, is a small replica of Mardocks. So you see, we were getting on in the world."

She smiled across the space at him, a friendly, delicious, challenging smile.

"I should love to stop at Mardocks, and go in to Gorham Lacy at week ends. Daddy might agree to it, for he is Scotch, and never refuses anybody anything for their good. But my father never would! She has disapproved of Mardocks all along. She was far prouder of Bee's V. A. D. uniform than of my uninteresting schoolmarm's frock."

"It is a charming frock," murmured the Canon.

"It cost very little; I made it myself," she answered unexpectedly. "But won't you be late for Mrs. Manning, Canon? She likes her tea punctually at half-past four; it is quite that now."

The Canon started, thrust out a somewhat undignified exit.
"Poor dear!" murmured Mary with a somewhat mothering smile, usually reserved for her young charges. "He must have been quite good looking once. Wonder how he can stick Little Heath. Perhaps, like me, he has got to the heart of the people."

It was twenty minutes to five, and the mention of tea made her loiter for a refreshing cup before she started on her dusty ride. They did not leave afternoon tea at Coppets Mill, but the popular high tea at about six-thirty, when all the members of the family were supposed to be freed from the engagements of the day. Mrs. Freeland, however, had victims of altering all that when the new life at Gorham Lacy should begin. Mary knew that there was nobody in the Miles's house, for Mrs. Miles had informed her at dinner-time that she and Miles were to spend the afternoon at Basingfold. But the "White Horse" was left, where Mrs. Quigley would be delighted to give her a fragrant cup and morsel of homemade bread and butter for the most modest consideration. She decided on the "White Horse" and just fitting the key in the schoolroom door when she saw a tall figure in khaki crossing the road. As he approached her his hand went to the salute. Mary was immediately conscious of a little flutter of expectation and excitement. Could he be by any chance the new squire, and she was the first to welcome him to Mardocks? He was a very lean, brown person, with rather strongly marked features and a pair of very keen blue eyes—the bluest Mary had ever seen in her life; they reminded her of pictures she had seen representing the colour of eastern seas. As he quite evidently wished to speak to her she walked down the path to meet him. He saluted, and said in a crisp, pleasant voice: "Will you be so good as to tell me whether I am right for the Manor House of Mardocks?"

Mary nodded.

"You are—the gates are a little way further down, just opposite the White Horse Inn. But you can go through the churchyard if you like. There is a wicket at the far side, and it is a short cut to the house."

"Thanks, I'll take that. What a sweet old-world spot it is! I've never seen anything like it in my life."

His voice was so friendly that Mary on the spur of the moment, said "Are you by any chance Major Manning?"

He smiled.

"How has my fame preceded me?" he asked, leaning slightly on the gate-post and contemplating with quite evident pleasure Mary Freeland's fresh face and winning smile.

"Why, we've all been waiting for you for ages. The whole village is agog with expectation. You ought to have had triumphal arches and all that instead of coming in so humbly on foot. It looks as if you had walked all the way from Basingfold."

"I have; is there anything wonderful about that? It is a very short distance."

"You found it so? Why, even I sometimes think it long on my bicycle."

"Do you often cycle there, then?"

"Every day. I live at Basingfold, but I work here. I am Mary Freeland, the school teacher."

"So you lead the young idea how to shoot in Mardocks village?"

"Oh, no; I simply lead them through the various standards set by the education authorities. It isn't very interesting; there is no scope for individuality in it."

"Ah, I am sure you would invest it with individuality."

"No, I do not. I do what I'm paid for, nothing more and no less, Major Manning," said Mary, smiling in the same friendly fashion. "What a pity you were not a few minutes earlier, then you would have had company across the park; the Rector of Little Heath, Canon Severn, has come up to tea with Mrs. Manning."

"Tell me about her. I have never seen her. Have I an ordeal in front of me?"

Mary pondered a moment and then shook her head.

"What might be an ordeal to some would not be anything of that sort to you," she answered on the spur of the moment, and then regretted her own temerity.

"Supposing you explain that," he suggested, showing very even teeth in a happy smile.

But Mary drew back a little suddenly, made aware that she was being very unconventional and unorthodox, and that Mrs. Manning would be very angry if she could have overheard her.

"I am being very rude, Major Manning and if you knew how anxiously your arrival is expected at the Hall you would hurry up there now."

"Would it? But it is very pleasant here talking to you. Shall I find you here to-morrow?"

"I am in the school in school hours," Mary answered guardedly, and with a little nod passed through the gate wheeling her bicycle. She changed her mind about going to the Vicarage for tea, and mounting her machine before Manning's admiring eyes rode off without once looking back.

THINK WOMEN WILL WIN OUT

LONDON, Nov. 18.—(By The Canadian Press)—Women athletes are in revolt against the decree of the Women's Amateur Athletic Association that they must wear "half-sleeved" vests for running and jumping.

Revolutionary Eye Says: "We don't like sleeves! They impede our arm action in running." So the call to 'arms' has gone out, and at the general meeting of the Association a champion of the Metcham Athletic Club will move that sleeves be reduced to only one inch in length, while the London Olympiads and the Mid-dlesex Ladies' Clubs will move the total abolition of sleeves.

It is expected that the women will—as usual—get their own way.

PRINCE NEVER ASCENDS WITH OUT ACHUTE

LONDON, ENGL., Nov. 18.—(By The Canadian Press)—Included in the equipment of the West's biplane which is usually employed by the Prince of Wales on time-saving official journeys, when he does not wish to use one of his own light planes, is of course a parachute for the Prince's use. Like every other pilot or passenger in a Royal Air Force plane the Prince never ascends without a chute. But the Prince was asked recently whether he knew how to use it. "No," he replied, "and I don't want to."
