MORE HUMOURS OF HISTORY

A. D. 1377.—At the Coronation of Richard, son of the Black Prince, who was ten years old, the Lord Mayor put up a fountain of running water. During his reign a council was appointed, the King's uncles, the Dukes of Lancaster and Gloucester, struggling for domination. A tax called the Poll Tax levied on all persons above fifteen years of age excepted, gave an alarming impetus to vagrancy, and caused the rebellion led by Wat Tyler.

THE RED VULTURE BY FREDERICK SLEATH

Along the old road as he headed until it met the wilderness, then he stepped out over the moor in a direction opposite to that of the chase of the night before; and he sought the high ground and here to it as much as possible, the crests and sudden slopes of ridges, for there the going was easiest; also, he made many detours in preference to traversing ground which, though passable, was difficult; for he did not want to carry the girl. There was something new in their relationship which was mysterious to him; which made him wish to keep her at a distance, or rather to keep from going nearer—a feeling undefined, an instinct, akin, to that, perhaps, which makes a horse veer away from some obstacle, big or small, on the road; there it was. She was no longer only a charge to him. She had become a personality able to affect him by her very presence, in diverse ways; a factor influencing both his actions and his thoughts, and the latter, not as formerly, merely in the direction of what he might do; but of what she might lead him to do; a much subtler, more complex problem altogether. The range of which he preferred to delay. Too much was happening too quickly. Although it was not an uncomfortable feeling, vaguely he felt they were drawing too near.

They were a silent trio all the way, he self-absorbed; she, soon feeling the strain of the journey severely enough to wish to keep from talking; while the inspector saw that his conversation was not wanted, and held his peace. He was an odd man out, awkward and restless; suspicious and puzzled concerning the relationship of the pair. Now he walked on one side of them, now on the other, more out of habit, always his glance going to the girl and the man; around, quickly, shiffling; but whatever he did was ignored.

Conscious though she was of his watchfulness, and at first inclined to resent it, before the journey was done she had begun to think more kindly of him. There was a vein of consideration in his nature, she discovered, and a certain modesty, all the more remarkable disclosed in one such as he.

He, being near her once on a stiff ascent, put out his hand suddenly as though to help her; as suddenly withdrew it, as though fearing he presumed. Her intuition told her that he was a very lonely man; her intelligence, that his faults and oddnesses, many of them, were the results of his loneliness, the weeds that grew on the human self out of the sight of human eyes. Also she saw that, physically and mentally, he was a very strong, very formidable man, one who approached more nearly the calibre of her rescuer than she had thought possible for any man to do; and with a sudden stirring of her interest, even a sense of satisfaction, she realized that Fate had thrown her into the company of two extraordinary men, the like of whom she had never seen before, and never again would see. Nevertheless in time she was looking forward very keenly to the end of the first part of their journey, when she would be rid of one of them; when she would be left alone with the other who might carry her then.

She was becoming very tired; her feet were pinched and sore. Physically discomfort adding to the distraction of a mind already nearly overborne, her thoughts confused, her emotions a medley, even she found herself beginning to cherish a grievance that two such men should calmly expect her to go on uncomplainingly, on and on over such a moor.

But at last the end of the outward trip was near. They came to a ridge above a great dip of the ground, across which, miles away, she laid herself down immediately, and they rested near each other, she, elbows on the ground, her chin in her palms, looking away across the dip towards the twinkling lights of the town. So thoughtful she seemed that he wondered.

"Are you sorry you came?" he asked, after a pause. "No. Oh, no!" "What are you thinking about?" "That he might at least have said 'Good-bye.'" "What?" "I do think so," she said solemnly. "The nearly burst out laughing surprised and amused at the subject of her thoughts, still more amused at her manner. "Old Banuk is too wily a fox," he answered, "to bark near an unknown road." "But he would not have said 'Good-bye' in any case!" "Perhaps he wouldn't," he admitted. "Still, it was caution that kept him quiet down there. I did not were the heights of a town; still farther on, rising above some high land, the square of this manufacturing city by the sea.

There was a sense of the sea's nearness, the long dip letting the salt air through; but it was still far away. They had reached another march of the moor. On their left, a forest of pines behind the cottage, which came down many miles from the hills at this point and spread into the dip below. Into its outlying growth John Henry led them—a precaution, hidden by the trees, they came to a road. He touched the inspector on the shoulder and pointed. The inspector nodded and left them, without a word.

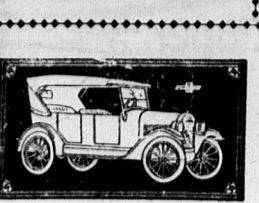

Watching him walk away so calmly, John Henry liked the man, well hidden he himself was among his hills. Not so the inspector, the most marked of men to their foes. The audacity of his conduct appealed to him strongly; the audacity that was his conduct, the utter fearlessness, the supreme imperturbability, daily shown. He watched him till the darkness fell between.

Turning, he saw the girl. Half screened by a dwarf shrub, she stood awaiting him just within the forest border, and the instant her glances met, the thought came to each, obnoxious to the other, that they were alone. Awkwardly he approached her, and they did not speak; they went away together, and she did not offer to take his arm. For this there was an excuse, however, in the cramped and tortuous way which prevented them from walking comfortably side by side; an excuse which ceased to be when they emerged from the trees and began to climb the more open ground to the ridge-top. Shyly she took his arm then, tentatively, her hold scarce a hold at all.

"Come along, Betty. You will need my help here," he said gently, and drew her arm through his own; and the constraint was gone; she leaned on him, holding with both hands, the fingers interlocking, a confident, intimate attitude, but she did not break the silence, nor did he, till the climb was done.

"We'll rest here for a bit," he said. "The ground is quite dry now." She laid herself down immediately, and they rested near each other, she, elbows on the ground, her chin in her palms, looking away across the dip towards the twinkling lights of the town. So thoughtful she seemed that he wondered.

THAT CAR OF YOURS BY HARRY E. PORTER

This is a series of articles pertaining to maintenance and repair of your Automobile. We will be glad to answer through this column, questions regarding your car or its mechanism. Send your inquiries to "Automobiles," The Guardian Publishing Co., Ltd., Charlottetown.

BRAKE ADJUSTMENT

"Old home week" and its heavy traffic in the City must needs cause you to consider the safety of the people and yourself. This article is written in time for you to prepare your car for the strain to which it will be subjected during your travels "Old Home Week." Also it is the time for you to prepare yourself for the strain to which you, personally will be subjected.

The predominant feature is brakes, and good brakes; reliable, active and flexible. Brakes that will give you confidence to drive your car in dense traffic and to protect you and your passengers against inconsiderate and foolish drivers. Remember that there is no humiliation to allowing the other fellow to pass you on the road, to cut corners in front of you. Discretion is the better part of valour and every other car has the right of way. It may not be possible in the interim for you to get your brakes properly adjusted.

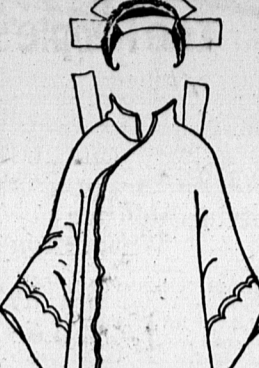

Try it yourself. It is quite simple. The brake band is really in two halves anchored at the rear of the drum. With this in mind adjust in the following manner: First, lengthen pull rods until the rear pull levers connected to the brake band shafts, lay back against the differential housing. You cannot adjust brakes by shortening the pull rods. After rods are let out and the brake bands expanded to their maximum screw down the anchor bar adjustment at the rear of brake bands until the band almost touches the brake drum. (The car should of course have both rear wheels jacked up.) The brake band must not drag at the anchor bar. Next, release, or lower the two nuts at the front of brake band, underneath the front anchor. By lowering these nuts toward the ground the lower half of the band will go up closer to the brake drum. Get this up as far as possible without dragging. After this has been done, screw down on the nut at the top of the brake band at the front anchor. There should be about .025 inch of clearance between the band and drum, all around.

After this it might be necessary to shorten the pull rods, but is seldom the case. With an assistant operating the brake pedal see that both wheels are braking equally. The emergency brake is adjusted without the car is jacked up by shortening the pull rods at the turnbuckles. Be sure no brake is dragging and all brakes are released. say anything either. Hunted men talk as little as they can when they are on the move." "But he is not hunted?—not as you as we are?" "He is." "You realize that I have been fighting that gang for over a year—the only man to be doing so, too. They have been trying their hardest to finish him off, and now they will be after him harder than ever." "I did not know that," she murmured, then she asked, "Is he coming back?" "I am meeting him over there four nights from now." "Over at that town?" "Yes."

Silent for a little while, she said almost in a sigh—"I do wish you hadn't to go." "Why?" he asked quickly, afraid that she was asking apprehensive of being left alone. (To Be Continued) Rub linseed oil into your linoleum once or twice a year and it will keep in good condition. 2054-7-4-41.

Aladdin's Lamp COLOR CUT-OUTS

THE LAMP BRINGS RICHES

This is one day's chapter of the story of "Aladdin" if you color and cut out the dolls every day you will have a whole set of dolls which to act out the famous old tale.

To hear is to obey, answered the ring genie and before he had time to breathe Aladdin was once more in his mother's house. Aladdin and his mother were so poor that they decided to sell the lamp to buy food. But when they started to polish it to make it look prettier another genie even more horrible than the ring genie appeared before them.

"What dost thou wish?" he asked. "I and the other slaves of the lamp stand ready to serve thee." From then on whenever Aladdin or his mother were in need of anything they had only to ask the genie of the lamp and immediately it was theirs. (Make the mother's dress lavender trimmed in purple, with the head band to match.)
