Strange But True

By F. E. MacArthur

There were no baby sitters in pioneer days but the head of the household knew how to spank a naughty child even if he didn't know how to change its diaper.

Did you know that diseased plants run a temperature? For example, fungus diseases produce a higher temperature than virus diseases.

In British Barbados, when a husband and wife decide to separate they also separate their home by sawing it in halves. These homes are called "divorce houses".

The United States, Great Britain and Canada, swallow 57 million aspirin tablets every 24 hours, to relieve headaches, hangovers, reduce fevers, and what have you. Aspirin is the most useful and the most harmless drug on the market.

Many years ago a meteorite fell on the Wilson farm not far from Cornwall, Prince Edward Island. The strange fireball was sighted by the MacCormick sisters, Mary and Margaret. The object appeared in the sky about 10 p.m. The sisters watched it coming from the direction of Charlottetown, its path could be traced to a point above the East Wiltshire Road where it exploded with considerable noise, and then fell directly across the road onto the Wilson farm.

The next morning the sisters went to investigate and lo and behold they found the object of their search buried some two feet in the earth. It was the size of a muskmelon and looked like a burned out piece of coal, the sisters said. Meteorites are difficult things to pin down, yet scientists must admit that meteors do exist, and some actually fall to earth — like the one seen by the MacCormick sisters many years ago.

What strange power enabled Elley Bowers to divine the richest silver mine in history — or was it just a hunch? Back in 1858, in a shack in the mining town of Johnstown, Utah Territory, Elley Bowers gave the following cue to a bewildered prospector by the name of Peter O'Riley: "There's a valuable deposit up on the hill near the ravine. It's yours for the tapping. It will be the richest mine ever discovered."

The woman whose hunch had brought a fortune to several persons, now had to turn her mansion into a tourist resort. The venture didn't pay off, however, and two years later she was minus a home.

She went to Virginia City and lived with a friend for a time. Finally she drifted to California where she entered a home for the aged. The date was 1900. Three years later at the age of 77 she died. Today she sleeps on the hill behind the mansion, and hard by the worked out lode.

Her former home has changed hands several times in the years that stand between, but in 1946 the Reno Women's Civic Club bought the mansion to be used as a memorial to the men and women of Nevada who gave their lives in World War II.

In the spacious entry hall may be seen a piece of scarlet brocade hanging on a rack. There are a few pictures of the rich-poor woman to be seen in the great library room — the only existing links between the dead and the living. Such are the workings of the finge-

In an unusual case just as Miss Comstock Lode — the richest silver mine on earth. Peter O'Riley was Elley's star border and, quite naturally, she wanted O'Riley to find the treasure.

After months of futile digging and discouragement O'Riley and a pal named McLaughlin came upon a mass of decomposed black sulphate of silver filled with free gold the legendary Comstock Lode.

The mine came to be named for Comstock because he had filed a prior claim to the location, and rather than get tangled up in a lawsuit O'Riley took him into the deal and the famous lode was given his name. Elley also became a partner in the fabulous mine.

She and her husband built the Bowers mansion at a cost of $300,000 and furnished it with trimmings and what have you to the tune of another $100,000. And why not? The property was paying off at the rate of $90,000 a month. The couple had more money than they knew what to do with.

But ten years later, the fates decreed that Elley would end up on skid row. Her husband died and so did most of his speculations.

Finally Elley was forced to sell stock in the mine and lost the controlling interest. From that time on it was swift descent to the valley of poverty.

WORKING WITH CANADIANS IN EVERY WALK OF LIFE SINCE 1817

Donat Constant of Portland, Maine, created the 2nd of every month. Why? Because the 34-year-old sleepjacker had had two bad falls in his career, both on that date.

While hurrying to help a farmer with a sick cow, Charles Dallow of Faben, Alberta, was arrested at Wainwright for passing a stop sign. In court he pleaded guilty and was fined $5 by a justice — the farmer who phoned him for help.

The entanglement of telephone messages are often a source of good jokes especially when one is put on to a wrong connection and receives some amazing questions and answers. Any writer with a good imagination would be able to give us an amazing story if he took time out to visit half a dozen holders of phones and gather up the material supplied him.

A Boston newspaper reporter who was driving in the neighbourhood of Concord, New Hampshire, observed the footprints of some large animal in the snow, and taking out his note book entered the following
