Long Gowns Are Popular For Evening

The full-length evening gown is enjoying a real return to popularity, and at last evening's presentation of "Fashion For Fall," sponsored by the ladies branch of the Charlottetown Curling Club, several of these gowns, for the more formal occasions in the months ahead, were shown.

One of the most impressive of the gowns was a creation in black satin in a semi-fitted style. This gown featured shoe string straps and a panel descending from the waist. It was modeled by Miss Lois Shaw. Mrs. James Grindlay's evening gown was in an emerald green shade, with short sleeves and scooped neckline. The softly flowing skirt of this gown swept into a slight train in back.

An abundance of fur trim was evident in suits and coats for the winter months and one of the coats that showed evidence of this trend was modeled by Miss Carol McKenzie. The coat styled along simple lines, was given a "high-fashion" look with a black fox collar and cuffs. Black accessories completed this ensemble.

For cocktails and then on to the dance. Mrs. C. M. MacLean chose a red sheath cocktail gown with a draped effect accenting the strapless bodice. A floating panel added an interesting note to the simple sheathed skirt. With her ensemble Mrs. MacLean wore "dyed-to-match" shoes.

In the sportswear department Millie Mullins chose an outfit that will take her through many relaxing hours. Her tartan wool slacks teamed with a turquoise pullover sweater with long sleeves, made a comfortable and smart costume for relaxing.

For the young sophisticate, Barbie MacDonald chose an olive green brocade dress with a bateau neckline v'ed in back and a softly gathered skirt. Black suede pumps and black accessories complimented this dress, which was designed with the 5'1" and under miss in mind.

A coat, that would be a welcome addition to any girl's winter wardrobe, was a ¾ length in silvertone. The coat featured a wedding ring collar and bracelet-length sleeves, and was modeled by Mrs. Ken Jenkins.

For afternoon, Mrs. Ron Ketch, chose a sheath dress of white wool, basket weave, with scarf neckline. The scarf was detachable, revealing a jewel neck. To compliment her dress Mrs. Ketch chose a coffee brown, high-crown sailor with multicolored feather trim.

Of course, a curling club fashion show wouldn't be quite complete without showing the latest fashion for the rink, so Carol MacKenzie modeled an ensemble designed to make every lady on the ice envious. Her black nylon slacks were teamed with a orlon curling sweater in a Tyrolean pattern in shades of green, yellow and black on white.

For those quiet winter afternoons, Nancy Grindlay chose a gold angora cardigan and teamed it with a plaid straight skirt for a comfortable and fashionable outfit.

Mrs. Lloyd MacLeod showed how the "budget-watcher" could be fashionable when she chose her double purpose evening gown which was one of the most attractive and definitely the most unusual gowns shown. Heather's gown of montego blue French voile featured a full length bouffant overskirt, that was off in a minute to reveal a cocktail sheath. The bodice of the gown was simply styled to compliment both dresses.

For afternoon Mrs. David Nicholson modeled a basic wool sheath in pale grey, with jewelled neckline and matching tie-belt. Her hat was in a peacock blue shade. Mrs. William MacGregor chose her afternoon dress in a olive green shade, sheathed, with a draped ascot at the neckline. She complimented this dress with a matching velour hat.

The three-piece suit modeled by Mrs. Alfred MacNeil was in pale grey teamed with the darker Oxford gray, the suit was accented with a hat in a "briar rose" shade.

Another "show-stopper" was a gold lame sheath evening gown modeled by Mrs. William Boyles. This "dazzling" dress featured a scoop neckline and was sleeveless. The "perfect finishing touch" was added to this evening ensemble by gold pumps.

Mrs. George Kays chose a two piece afternoon dress in black. The cropped jacket had wedding ring neckline and button fringe, and underneath a basic black sheath so suitable for many occasions.

Mrs. Ivan Laurie's basic dress was of red wool jersey in a sheath style. The dress was belted at waist with a wide leather belt and featured patch pockets.

For evening Mrs. Maurice Blacke chose a gown of white brocade with emerald green peau-de-soie back bodice and panels in back of skirt. The gown had shoe-string straps and a bow added back interest.

In the pictures above (left to right) Mrs. James Grindlay is modeling a charcoal voille coat and her hat is in carbon grey; Miss Shaw's coat is in raspberry red; Mrs. Boyle's dress, in autumn shades of gold, olive green, charcoal and tangerine. Her hat is in harvest gold; Mrs. Nicholson's dress, blue plaid; Carol MacKenzie, black curling slacks and Tyrolean sweater; Mrs. Jenkins, black curling slacks and loden green and black jacket; Mrs Kays, black "Georgette" gown with gold and silver embroidered bodice; Mrs. MacLean, red sheath cocktail gown.

The clothes for the show were supplied by Moore and MacLeod Ltd. and the shoes were through the courtesy of LePage Shoe Company.

ELLEN'S DIARY

Fall Vacation Slips By, In Fast Pace Of Harvesting

"I figured that out, about the rabbits" Alex reported, coming by this morning when we, at this house, were at breakfast. "When I woke — before I got up, it came to me" he smiled.

"That's the best time of day to work out any problem, isn't it? Before one's mind gets all cluttered up with the doings of the day" we said.

He nodded. "I've decided to put them in a box, cover it with a wire-screen, and take them indoors to Peter. Then I can do my work in peace! He can enjoy them while I clean out their hutch, put fresh straw in their bed, and food and water in their livingroom. They" he remembered "are great eaters! And they aren't fussy and they like so many things."

And hearing his plans, it came to mind, that more than one good farmer and stockman of our acquaintance, gained their early experience in caring for livestock, from tending faithfully just such pets as are Alex's.

"I wish there was a radio on that tractor I drive" Mack offered with some longing today.

"A radio!" James echoed, as though he had not heard aright.

"Yes. I'd like to get caught up on some of the new songs of the Hit Parade, now that I'm into my holidays," he said.

"And what about getting caught up with the harvest?" James questioned with a bit of a smile.

Into the Fall holidays— gift of the little school down the River Road, its children are now. How fast the days will glide by them, as they lend their assistance to the harvesting of the grain and potatoes! The latter comes late this year, we reflect. It has reverted to that season of harvesting we knew in our own schooldays, when we gathered up the McIntyre blues, the large white-mealed reds, that were turned out row by row by a beater-digger and team of horses, and we came to the picking in the frosted mornings of October.

Frosted mornings! And yet how summery the day could turn, full of sunlight and gentle winds, which usually for us, held the salty tang of the sea.

It was a pretty autumn sunset this evening, which kindled, and flamed, and spread its clouds of deep colors, that faded before long to a deep rose above the dark woodlands to the west. And the dusk came down silently over the rim of hills, dimming the quiet fields. So still it was then. Echoes lingered hollowly about. Somewhere a dog barked excitedly.

Somewhere a farmer called his cows in from the pasture to the milking.

"That" Alex, hearing it smiled "is exactly the way Gran'daddy calls ours to come in to the stable!"

But James and the other men and lads of the family were still at the threshing. We could year the sound of it— that old beat borne across fields between, to us here.

Night is here now. Work of day done. James unlaces his boots— the same that we suspect, has today gone miles.

"This is not like those harvests we knew, Ellen, when the sheaves rustled as we stored a last load of the day, by lanternlight. There's too little rustle to them this year!" he sighs.

Until tomorrow— Diary — Good-night...

MARY HAWORTH

Mother Needs Help Telling Facts Of Life To Young Son

Dear Mary Haworth: In a recent column you mentioned appropriate books on the facts-of-life for a boy 16. Could you please name one appropriate for boys aged 9 and 11?

When I ask at libraries and bookstores, they look at me aghast, as if I had asked for a list of CIA agents!

My boys are nice youngsters. I'd like a book not too heavy for them, but written with faith. Thank you.— R.T.

Dear R.T.: Searching my mind, I find no record of ever having come across a book about the facts of life, written in faith, that impressed me as being especially suitable for 9-to-11-year-olds.

I am not saying such books don't exist. They may. Here is a suggestion that might prove helpful: write to the publication department, Association Press (an affiliate of the national YMCA) at 291 Broadway, New York 7, N.Y., and ask for a check-list of its books and —or pamphlets (if any) that contain properly rationed sex instruction for children your sons' age. — M.H.

Dear Mary Haworth: Just a few words to commend you for another excellent column—this one your recent discussion of the problem of loneliness and how to manage it profitably.

A correspondent had asked for a reading list to help her conquer loneliness and a sense of inadequacy.

In reply you gave a truly wonderful thumbnail sketch of loneliness as a possible vocation (as a path to growth in wisdom, understanding and usefulness), and suggested some fine books and pamphlets showing the way.

May I add to your list two pamphlets, namely: "God's Nearness to Us in Loneliness" and "The Trials of Life and How to Bear Them," both authored by the Rev. P. Coffey, Ph.D., published in London and available (for about 25 cents each) at the Van Antwerp Pamphlet Shop, 1232 Washington Boulevard, Detroit, Mich.—W.L.

Dear Mary Haworth: I am a widower, twice, and don't expect to marry again.

When I was young, women wore their dresses too long, sweeping the floor and the street. Now they have gone to the other extreme, with skirts so short they don't cover the knee, indeed sometimes scarcely even the thigh when the wearer is seated.

On TV you see women of grandmother and great- grandmother age wearing this kind of thing. In summer, on the streets and in parks women of all types and sizes are on parade in skin-tight short- shorts and brassiere tops.

It is embarrassing to men to have wives, daughters, sisters and mothers flaunting their flesh in this manner. Yet we men have learned long since to keep quiet about it, if we would live in peace with women.

Modesty in dress and deportment is a woman's greatest glory. When this virtus is cast aside, God help the world, for it is sinking over its head into sin. I am no saint, but I am sickened by women's dress today. Why have they so forgotten modesty?

Dear J.S.: When women discard modesty and men are apathetic about it, a society is nearing the end of its rope as a creative force, students of history tell us

In such case, what is going on is this: the people as a whole have lost their moral vigor, their spiritual dynamism, their awareness of God. They have become more insensate than alive, as regards their human potentials.

In a kind of stupor they resort blindly to aphrodisiac stimuli to try to feel more "quick" than dead. Maybe that explains why women today are stripping more, while men are reacting less.— M.H.
