Fall's Luscious Fruit Makes Bedtime Snack

LATE in the evening, choose fresh fruit for a bedtime snack. It is refreshing, leaves the mouth in alkaline condition during the night, which is excellent for the preservation of the teeth.

And fresh fruit produces natural roughage, which exerts a gentle digestive stimulus during the night, helping to overcome intestinal stasis. Old and young may well take advantage of nature's health-promoting gift.

Measurements are level.

Ingredients: Four boiled breasts pheasant chicken, 4 strips salt pork, 1 tsp. salt, ¼ tsp. pepper, 5 tbsp. flour, ½ c butter, 2 fresh shallots chopped (or ½ tsp. freeze-dried shallots) ¾ tsp. coarse black pepper, 1 juniper berry (crushed fine), ¼ c. white wine (or white grape juice), 2 c. chicken broth, 1 c. sour cream, juice ½ lemon.

Wrap breasts with salt pork strips. Mix salt, pepper and 2 tbsp. of flour. Coat breasts with this mixture.

Heat 3 tbsp. butter in fry pan until golden. Add breasts and saute until golden-brown on both sides. Cover; slow-cook 15 to 20 min. or until fork-tender. Remove breasts to heated serving platter.

The Sauce: Add remaining butter to fry pan. Saute fresh shallots in it until lightly browned. (If shallots are freeze-dried do not saute but add to flour.) Stir remaining flour into butter.

ELLEN'S DIARY

Dainty White Blanket Settles Over The Valley

It was a rather wan sun that looked out over the farmlands at its setting today. No rose-glow attended it, but in amber it went. Yet the brightness was reflected prettily on the white of the fields, where fetching little paths of light led up to the west. It was, all in all, a pretty scene November gave.

James, closing openings to the cellar, stopped a moment to regard field and sky.

"The weather hasn't altogether cleared yet, Ellen" he commented. "See, how the snow still clings to the trees."

"What about the plowing?" Mack, come by then, wondered.

"That's a good quest'n" James smiled a bit ruefully.

"We have a nice lot done."

"Oh yes. And this snow may clear away. There may come spells yet when the plow will run. We never know."

"If we lose the snow — it will have been a help. The land won't be so dry for it."

"That's true" James agreed. "And the wells and brooks will fill. As they should by rights, before the winter sets in. They have been too low this fall. Indeed, I heard your Dad say today, that he had never seen the mill-stream so low."

It flowed clear between its moulded white banks then we came to the mailbox at lane's and this morning. Every exposed stick, and islet in it, was fetchingly white - capped... The asters and sedges, and all the glory of the Autumn's golden-rods, and other blossoming as there, are about gone now. Sere blooms and brittle stocks remain. The alders too are stark, stripped of their dark green leaves. How quiet it was there, where from the springtime and on through the summer, the voices of many birds can be heard. No sound. Only that of the traffic on the Highway, Scampie's bark from the yard above, and the solemn ripple of the stream's flow.

"Isn't it funny how icicles hang!" Peter commented of those clinging to today's eaves. "Oh I wouldn't say that — it's pretty" you mean.

Have outgrown my skates— and where are they?" he wondered.

There was some banking done today — some piglets were "treated"... a grist was brought in... indoors there were loaves to make, and meals to prepare, that for both farmers and cooks, in no time the hours winged by. And a small wind brought the dusk down.

Dusk, and a blue sky to be the backdrop of night. And a moon almost full, rising presently above a barn-gable.

"It's a lovely night, Ellen" Pames offers, come now from an end of choring.

"A winter night" he observes, "come too soon." He hangs up cap and jacket, and smiles to the pair of lads who came in at his heels.

"How about a bit of lunch, Mother?" he grins.

Alex nods and smiles.

'Yes, how about it?" Mack queries.

Until tomorrow — Diary — Good - night.....
