The Not-So Dire Situation in Ottawa Don't Expect the Government to Fall Anytime Soon

Last week, the media speculated on a crisis in Parliament Hill that threatened to bring down the government of Paul Martin and likely send Canadians back to the polls within after the last election. Expectations of media speculation concerning a Martin government being "re-elected" or not, but don't expect a minority government to...

they control the house, but if this is not the case things get interesting, as some lines were drawn in the sand last week. The NDP planned to vote with the Liberals against the amendment before it was revealed, while the Conservatives were to vote with the Bloc. These two rival camps appear to have emerged. The NDP and the Liberals combined control 153 seats, as do the Bloc and the Tories. If these parties vote together, the dividing vote belongs to an independent MP, Chuck Cadogan, a former Conservative who failed to win the party nomination in the last election. While many expect him to vote with the Conservatives, he did not reveal which side he would have voted with last week. If all four parties fail to co-operate and these two camps emerge on some vote, this single independent would hold "balance of power in the House of Commons."

However, this may not happen. On Friday, the Liberals introduced tough new legislation to combat child pornography which is sure to please the Conservatives who have been pushing for this. Expect the parties to work together, despite continuing to throw political barbs back and forth, and the media to use these comments to exaggerate the situation. At the same time, remember, the average minority government has lasted 18 months. It would be a safe bet to expect more of the same in this government, because for at least a year, no party will be willing to force an election and face angry voters.

And all four parties say they want this minority government to work, but how exactly will this work? If all members are present, 154 votes are needed for a majority. If any three of the parties vote together...
