Reducers Boost Morale

By Ida Jean Kain

Of the millions of words written on reducing, this dietitian finds that letters from jubilant reducers are the best morale boosters and can do more than anything else to help you get down to normal weight.

Attention, Mr. Here's a letter from a triumphant gentleman from Michigan.

"I started trying to reduce a year ago. At first I went on a rigid diet and almost starved to death. Couldn't stick with it very long. Tell your overweight men that they can reduce on man-sized diets. The secret is to start the day with eggs. The other meals can include plenty of broiled meat or fish, lots of vegetables, and salads with low calorie salad dressing. I had a slice of bread at each meal. I'm 6 foot one inch and, eating that way, I went from 245 to 195. Never felt better in my life! I hope this note encourages other overweights to lighten the load."

A successful Maine reducer who has proved an inspiration to folks in her home town passes on her story.

"I have lost 74 pounds, going from 210 to 136, which for my 5 feet 7 inches makes me fairly slender. And I feel just wonderful. For reducing, I followed no diet pills and took no reducing pills — I merely followed a low calorie menu built on the protective foods and combined dieting with light exercise. Your articles on changing one's attitude toward food and developing a new philosophy proved to be especially helpful."

"You may be interested to know that I have gone through just what a metamorphosis that since last winter I have had a group of overweights after me to start a reducing club. Everyone seems to feel I am a personal inspiration to them. I have even started four men on a dieting program!"

"It is a glorious feeling to look so much better, feel so well, and have so many people saying such nice things about my appearance. All right, dietier, carry on. After Labor Day report your progress. Your dietitian is taking a vacation. Tune in again the last week in August. In the meantime, happy summer slimming."

ELLEN'S DIARY

By An Island Farmer's Wife

"I wish Saturday hadn't come," Mack offered this afternoon. Ellen and Gage, his cousin and elder, were seated in a shady corner of the front verandah hiving come there for the moment out of the sun and the heat. Crackers spread with a cheese mixture they lunched on, as one said out of respect for our "for Sunday" cleaning, "No! Why?" Gage smiled.

"Well, you'll be going home this evening, won't you? And then I'll be all alone."

"Yes, but if it's a fine day, I'll be seeing you on Monday, and that's only a day away."

"I know," Mack nodded, "but sometimes a day is a pretty long time. You'd think sometimes it would never, never go."

"Well, the week went fast, didn't it?"

"Yes, but you were here."

"Fast they slipped by, before we could even 'point their place' the weeks busy days of the haying, every sunny hour brimful of its affairs — our part to get the meals for James and a share of the help; dinner 'a little on the early side, Ellen," supper, the split second we get these loads stored.

"Now high, wide eaves' doors in the barns of this place show that mows are full."

"Even with today's machinery folded collars on rough tweed ensembles and many fur hats, muffs and collars in mink or ermine for afternoon."

FORMAL WEAR

For formal wear the draped midriff cut with back fullness often takes on a princess line, marked with fabric contrasts or embroidery.

Colors feature blacks and browns and soft grey brown hues. Pussy willow grey is effective for evening in short grey tulle ballerina formal shown under a full hooded cloak of this cloudy grey velvet.

Large triangular scarves of coordinated fabric replace classic stoles or jackets on other formal models.

Millinery is small, symmetrical and tipped forward.

Neat bumper brimmed rollers and twisted turbans or pillboxes are worn over snug jersey helmets which swathe the throat and tuck into the neckline of the costume.

Words Of The Wise

No More Kitchen Slaves

By Ida Bailey Allen

"I'm very bored, Chef," I remarked, "with all I read about the way women 'slave over a hot stove' in summer. It's just not so, because in all but a very small percentage of homes, coal, oil and wood-burning stoves have been superseded by gas or electric ranges."

MODERN EQUIPMENT

"Perhaps, Madame," replied the Chef, "the homemaker is not taking advantage of modern equipment and ready-prepared foods; or else she has not planned easy meals of foods suited to warm weather. She serves the same foods throughout the year as a sort of routine."

"This is undoubtedly true," I agreed. "Yet what tastes good in cold weather is not always appetizing when the weather is hot."

BALANCE OF NUTRIMENT

"I do not mean that the balance of nutrient in meals should be changed. We still need in summer the same relative amounts of protein, carbohydrates and fat a day, but foods should be daintier, often served cold, and contain plenty of garden vegetables, crisp salads, fresh fruits and cooling fruit juices."

STOVES ARE INSULATED

"As to the myth about the 'hot stove,' the ovens of gas and electric ranges for years have been insulated to retain heat, not to throw it off into the kitchen. Most stove kitchen heat comes from the top burners. So if the oven is in use for one food, plan to cook most of the others in the oven. It's just as good for boiling as top-of-the-range."

COOLING SUGGESTION FROM THE CHEF

Place an electric fan high up opposite a kitchen window. Pull down the window from the top and the fan will blow out the hot air and cooking odors.
