

Glaucoma Clinics Find 49 Suspects

A total of 418 persons were tested in the Charlottetown Lions Club Glaucoma clinic held at Zion Church yesterday. Out of this number there were 13 suspicious cases.

The total number tested at the two-day clinic was 819 with 40 suspicious cases being discovered. Dr. J.P. Lantz was the attending physician both days.

Three public health nurses assisted Dr. Lantz yesterday afternoon. They were: Ruth Ross, Mrs. Louise Roper and Alice Trainor. Stenographers working in the afternoon were: Mrs. Kent Irwin and Mrs. Eleanor Jay. The evening nurses were: Mrs. Eileen Bagnall, Mrs. Charles Beasley, Francis MacMillan and Mrs. Florence Hays. Evening stenographers were Ann Doyle and Betty Gallant.

RESPONSE GRATIFYING

T.L. Fitzgerald, chairman of the Charlottetown Lions Club Glaucoma clinics, said last night, "the public response to our clinics has been most gratifying. We would be happy if nobody had Glaucoma, but unfortunately this is not so. We can, however, be happy in the fact that many cases already discovered can be given treatment that will prevent possible blindness. If even one person's eyesight is saved, it will make this project worthwhile."

The next two Charlottetown clinics in the Glaucoma series will be held on November 2 and 3 to take care of the many people who had to be turned away at our opening clinic because of the tremendous response which was "much beyond our expectations."

"Those persons whose results were suspicious will be notified by letter in the immediate future."

Mr. Twaites pointed out lower total education in this country compared with the United States went along lower Canadian productivity with the result "individually we produce only about 70 per cent of the U.S. output with obvious implications to our comparative standards of living."

He went on to say that this data establishes improvement of "our stock of educational capital as the major task of the country."

While refusing to enter "the already controversial field of the professional educator," the lecturer told the audience "higher education is now, and must be to an increasing degree, assume the social and economic importance that elementary education held 35 to 50 years ago."

Suggesting it was time for dropping the old "cloister" idea of maintenance of academic standards as the only criteria for students and asked if a flat percentage ruling on university entrance, prevention of drop-outs resuming their studies, are compatible with society's "general need for upgrading education."

MAIN PROBLEM

The main problem of the future, he thought, would be to maintain and even increase standards while also permitting much broader participation in the higher education process. One of the ways of doing this might be a community college which would be a welcome to mature students who might not have achieved formal entrance requirements.

Mr. Twaites noted in some instances the adoption of tutorial methods "and a variety of devices aimed at communicating the greatest amount of knowledge to the student in the most efficient manner."

"We must not let educational methods be a barrier to learning as was sometimes the case in the past."

But he said universities cannot accept all the responsibility of upgrading education and elevation of basic knowledge standards must be emphasized at an earlier point in the educational cycle.

"By this I mean the introduction of new teaching methods and subjects at the primary and

Representatives of the East Prince Fisheries Association will be asked to meet with the cabinet at its meeting next Tuesday to discuss the possibility of government assistance for the fishermen of District Eight.

The vehicle was taken from 22 Hillsboro Street about 7:45 last evening and was found damaged on Great George Street near the provincial motor vehicle branch, reported a member of the Charlottetown Police Department.

Another reportedly stolen vehicle, a late model car owned by the Fisheries Research Board of Canada's technological research station at Halifax, and Dr. E. Graham Bligh, technological advisor to the fishermen of the fisheries research board, Ottawa. Dr. Drinnan is officer in charge of the oyster hatchery at Ellerslie.

Greater Oyster Growth To Mean New Markets

Production of oysters, now a luxury food where the demand is never matched by the supply, will be possible in such quantity in 10 years time that oyster fishermen will be looking for wider markets, Roy Drinnan, director of the oyster hatchery at Ellerslie, P.E.I., told the 10th Atlantic Fisheries Technological Conference here yesterday.

A few minutes later the conference was told thorough research of the oyster's chemistry is being undertaken, allied with the vast background of knowledge provided by research biologists, that should give a fairly complete story of this strange animal which means so many millions of dollars to Maritime fishermen each year.

end, it was explained. The three-day conference ends at noon today.

NEXT CHAIRMAN

Chairman for next year's conference—it will be held somewhere on the New Jersey coast—is James Brooker, chief inspection services, U.S. fisheries and wild life series, department of the interior, Washington.

Secretary for next year's conference will be Mrs. Mary Thompson, Paicagogua Laboratory, Mississippi.

Names of the chairman and secretary were announced at the closing banquet last night. Dr. Stewart said that serious problems could occur in the holding of live lobsters. One problem is the control of disease, another involves the laying of foundations for more profitable manipulation and the use of the resources.

Mr. Drinnan was telling the conference about the experimental oyster hatchery at Ellerslie where work was started last year on the rearing of oysters under controlled conditions. Last year the effort was largely a failure because some 90 per cent of the oyster spat died in silted water after they had been placed in the water.

This year, though, the spat were reared indoors until they were older, larger and harder and the results have been most encouraging.

Some 20 million eggs are available from one female oyster, but under natural conditions the mortality runs as high as 90 per cent. The oyster production potential is enormous if the techniques of the oyster hatchery, now apparently proven to be a successful way of raising spat, can be adapted to the commercial production on an economically acceptable basis, and there is evidence that they can.

The biological problems of the oyster rearing business have now been solved, Mr. Drinnan believes. The future development is more of engineering, where the problems of space and the mechanical part of the operation, can be developed to the greatest possible degree of efficiency.

Mr. Drinnan explained that the equipment used in the Ellerslie hatchery, for example, is not immediately adaptable to a commercial operation, because some of the equipment is too expensive, but he has no doubt that a successful commercial adaptation is in the near future.

Potato Pickers Still Needed

J.A. Murphy of the National Employment Service in Charlottetown, said yesterday there remains a "serious" shortage of pickers to harvest the potato crop on P.E.I.

He said 34 men have been placed and approximately 20 more are needed immediately.

Mr. Murphy said the Charlottetown branch of the unemployment office is trying to negotiate with other centers in the Maritimes to send pickers to the Island. A number of pickers have been hired from Cape Breton and New Glasgow.

Even though a number of schools will be closing in Queen's County to allow students to help with the picking, Mr. Murphy feels the unemployment office will not benefit as most of the students will be picking on their own farms and will not be available for work in other places.
