gap widens—against women! Don't relax your set standards, but don't expect them all to be embodied in a knight in shining armor.

DEAR MISS DIX: Do you think I would be doing wrong if I went to work again. My husband was killed in battle nine years ago, and I have taken care of my child and self ever since. I can't move without my daughter close to me, the only time she's not with me is when she's at school. Her teachers say it would be better for both of us if I went to work and had something to do during the day. Do you think that's right?

CARRIE

ANSWER: If your daughter can be cared for in the interim between school and your homecoming, I certainly think you would both benefit from your going back to work. The child is probably nine or ten now, at which age she should be developing a social life of her own, through Scouting, Camp Fire Girls or some such activity. Renewed interest in the outside world will be good for you, too. By all means try a job, at least long enough to see how it will affect you both.

DEAR MISS DIX: I have been going with a lady for quite a while, and we have seen each other often until about a month ago. Since then she has cut down on our dates, pleading business whenever I ask her to go out. I realize she is working hard, since she has her own shop, but wonder if this is just a gentle "brush-off"?

GEORGE H.

ANSWER: I think you have reached a quite accurate conclusion, George. All things point to the lady's lack of interest in your courtship. Stay away for a while, at least, and see if she misses you. parents, Mr. and Mrs. William Ferguson on January 30th.
