MARY HAWORTH

Heavy Petting Harmful For Teen-Age Couple

DEAR MARY HAWORTH I am a girl 18 and I have been dating a boy my age for about five months. We are both very magnetic to the opposite sex and had dated many others before we met. We have confessed to one another that we never loved before, nor ever became involved with anyone else.

Now after three months we find we love each other. And even though college careers are in view for each of us, we plan to marry eventually. I know that our relationship will continue to grow, as we have many similar interests and goals.

We both come of upper middle class families that are well known socially in the community. The problem is that after three months' steady dating we became involved in heavy petting that concerns me, as I feel it is morally compromising. I keep wondering if Tom has had previous experience of the sort. He says not, and I want to trust him. But if he hasn't, I wonder why he began it with me? Is it because he loves me? I hope so.

As time goes on, our feelings will become stronger. And as marriage is at least three years away, is it wrong to have such intimacy? We do love each other and, knowing this, we could wait. But do we have to, if marriage is in our future plans? I would appreciate an immediate answer.

DEAR D.R. According to your account, here condensed, of your psychologically disturbing petting relationship with

The Scent Of Clover Is The Essence Of Summer

Now on island farms, we awaken each morning to the affair of the having the thought comes to mind at first waking. If you have been reared on a farm, you quickly catch the fragrance of season. It comes in the clover scent with the early sounds, as rather indolent you lie there, in those exquisite moments, which come as it were between night and before you assume once more the responsibilities of your round.

This is a precious instant, wholly one's own, in which to think long thoughts, to weigh oneself critically in the balance, as to life and living, to draw a new blueprint in mind to follow. "This thing I should do or on the contrary, not do," before setting out along the course of the new day.

You scent the clover smell. It comes in it may be at an eastern trill window, with the bright trills of the birds, with the rustle of leaves, and the shimmer of sunlight in mirror, or on wall. And your memory goes back a long the years, as ours did this morning, to havings and haylands bygone. Somewhere in remembrance's folder, where we have fortunately recorded many a lovely memory, it was a July evening of an old time Sabbath day. The day had been beautiful, sunny and warm, as are those of early summer, and prettied with blossoms with acacia bloom and wild rose, with tangle of purple verbena and the dainty white of Queen Anne's Lace.

There was a summer song on the lips of the little brook that ran beneath the rustic bridge in the farm-lane, and slipped away amid ferns and rushes to the river, though naturally not with the lilt, lively refrain of the other days of the week. And you walked there with other children, beside a clovered meadow. A young miss, barely in your teens, a child only, wondering, questioning in mind "about childish things." Tomorrow, however, was to take you out of those years, and from all the folks and things you best loved, away from field and meadow, grove and strawberry, and the brook that flowed so free. True it would be only for a matter of a few days, but this forthcoming Matriculation Examination you were to write in that time left a vague uneasiness at heart. It was you were sure, that handwriting on the wall, the minister had spoken of in Church that morning, a sign which indicated a change from the kindly old ways. And you wished this last evening would go on forever, that this dusk would delay its fall. And then, to lighten every young worry over the strange days for you ahead, you caught the scent of the banks of purple clover from a new meadow of the hayland-tale. And the cares vanished. It was summer, and no matter what was to be, all would be well. This morning we were again a favored creature. The clover scent was on the air.

James, beside us, stirred wakefully. And at once took stock, by way of eye and ear, of the morning new-comes. "Are you awake, Ellen?" he inquired softly. "Then" he smiled, "what's keeping us here, with this promising to be a fine hay-day?" "How's everything?" we overheard a caller inquire this evening of the younger sons of the house across the lane. There was a moment of silence. "Not too good," Peter volunteered soberly. "Mack's gone away."

Clover scent this morning. Now a night-shower to accent it. And our Monday walks away in the dim. Until tomorrow - Diary Goodnight.
