New Adhesive Is Very Strong

Epoxy adhesive, so strong that a two-ton pull won't break the bond, is now available in easy-to-use metal tubes.

Now, instead of having to mix a full batch or risk an incorrect mix, you just squeeze equal length ribbons of resin and hardener from two tubes and blend them and you have exactly the amount you want. No trouble, no waste.

Some packages make it easier yet by providing a measuring scale along the length of the epoxy adhesive tubes.

Epoxy, of course, is the perfect adhesive material for almost anything that's broken around the house. It's equally good for mending furniture or chinaware. It's good for fixing breaks in heating pipes or the cooling system of an automobile.

It's the perfect substance for attaching fixtures to ceramic tiles in bathrooms.

Apple Bowls 'In' Again As Sign Of Hospitality

Years ago, the passing of the apple bowl during the evening was a sign of hospitality. Today it returns with other refreshments, as a gracious gesture, a "way out" for persons on reducing diets, denying themselves rich goodies; a way out for persons on low-salt or sugar-free routines; a way out for people who love to lurch a crisp apple. In some households, an apple bowl is waiting when the children rush home from school. Or it is often passed directly after dinner, sometimes accompanied with raisins, dates or nuts.

However served, the apple is valuable for its vitamin and mineral content, and for its valuable pectin which has a beneficial normalizing action on the intestines. In Washington, where the famous Washington State apples are grown, children eat many protective foods of which the apples are of leading importance because they are grown in mineral-rich volcanic soil.

WHEN YOU ENTERTAIN

Apple hors d'oeuvres are a welcome addition to a cocktail buffet. For instance: Apple-wiches: Two thin slices raw apple, put together like sandwiches, each with a matching thin slice of the white meat of chicken brushed with a dot of mayonnaise or drained cranberry-orange relish. MARY HAWORTH

Grandmother Is Upset Over Child's Treatment

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: I am a 63-year-old grandmother. My married son has two adopted children: a boy 3, and a girl, 5.

I am concerned about the girl. She is very stubborn and strong willed. She and her mother are always clashing.

The mother is very strong willed too, coming from foreign born parents who were very strict with her. She is using the same discipline with the little girl.

Being older, I have more patience and tolerance. I seem to be able to do more with her. I used to keep her quite a lot, but the mother resented my being able to do more with her.

I don't have her very often any more. I thought it would be better for everyone concerned. I realize the mother has continuing responsibility. But she thinks the child should mind like a 15-year-old.

They both have been to two different psychologists. They were told they didn't need a psychiatrist.

I don't know what is going to happen when the girl knows what adoption really is; already she knows she is an adopted child. I wish and hope that you might give me some helpful advice, or suggest helpful books to read.

DEAR K. R.: The most helpful thing you can do in the circumstances is love the little girl, with strong steadfast implicit protective awareness of her needs of understanding. And with profound empathy for her defenseless status in clashing with her mother's harshly authoritarian disciplinary demands.

The child who is given such compassionate unspoken psychological support from a discerning grandparent - able to see both sides when the child is in routine difficulties with a different parent - that youngster usually gets the message, on the subjective level, that "grnd ma (or Grandpa) really likes me for myself."

Thus fortified at heart, the child is better able to cope reflexively with parental harshness, with more pliability and detachment, and less sense of wracking injury, than would be possible otherwise.

The brand of "empathetic" advocacy that I am prescribing isn't a matter of interfering, in terms of taking sides vocally, either in the parents' presence or behind their backs.

Rather it is a matter of overall attitude, of one's whole being, in loving relationship to the child. It is an attitude of personal awareness and affirmative interest and dependable devotion focussed on the child, in his absence as during his presence. - It is just a matter of loving the child with great charity of spirit, just because of his need to be so loved, that he may know from direct experience the potential of generous trust-worthy goodness in human nature.

To illustrate: Grandma is visiting her son's large family. A 5-year-old tells Grandma to wait until he can fetch from upstairs a batch of crayon drawings. The child fails to return. When asked why, the child replies, "Daddy told me to go to my room and stay." Grand ma remarks, "I wonder why?" and the child's composure breaks into shamed sobbing. He says "I don't know why."

What is a grandmother to do? This grandmother lifts the child into her arms, holds him close, and carries him across the hall to her room, where, sitting on her bed, still holding him, she tidily mops his tearful face.

All this takes about two minutes, during which time her sense anguish echoes his, meanwhile her actions are matter of fact. Then the facade of normal chatter is resumed, as the two walk back to his room to read together.

The results are two-fold: (a) short-term and (b) long-term. The short-term first result is that the child's spirit is lifted, his inner dignity revived, his sense of face restored; he feels somehow absolved of nameless guilt and acceptable again.

The second, long-term result, as the grandmother and the parents are to learn, years later, is that this sudden flash of real spontaneous sharing of profound sorrow between Grandma and grandchild, relating to a problem neither could solve, had been an unforgettably reassuring experience other child inexpressibly consoling, perhaps by giving him a true conviction of inimitable inner relatedness to somebody special.
