

NATURAL PHENOMENA IN AUSTRALIA.

DISEASES AND THEIR REMEDIES.

Australia has been called the country of contrarities, not only in point of climate, but in nature itself. The diseases and infirmities of men are, however, the same in this remote region as at the centre of civilization, and here, as there, the common sense and practical experience of all classes have taught them the inestimable value of Professor Holloway's remedies, in the various maladies incident to the human race.

It might be thought, perhaps, that, because we abound in exceptions to all rules of natural history, because our swans are black, our cherries grow with the stones on the outside, our delicious-looking pears are solid wood, our bees are stingless, our flowers are scentless, our trees are barkless, our owls screech by day, and our cuckoos sing at night—that the complaints prevalent in Australia are also unusual, and cannot be reached and subdued by the preparations which have conquered sickness and death in every other region of the earth. This is a grave error. In these colonies above every other country under heaven, their success has been uniform and decided. It is true that the maladies most common in Australia, Van Dieman's Land, and New Zealand, have certain features which slightly distinguish them from their congeners in Europe, but these powerful remedies conquer every endemic symptom, and accomplish a cure with the same certainty that the correct application of mathematical principles solves a problem in the science of numbers.

Rheumatism, in peculiarly distressing forms, prevails in many of the gold districts, crippling the limbs and blasting the hopes of the miner. The Ointment, in all such cases, produces the most astonishing results. Contracted joints, when lubricated with this penetrating unguent, soon recover their flexibility; the pain and inflammation which accompany acute rheumatism are invariably relieved by its application, and even when all the limbs are partially paralysed by the disease, they rapidly recover the power of motion and their pristine vigour, as the flesh and muscular fibre absorb this revitalizing preparation, under the friction of the hand. Neuralgia, Tic-Doloureux, and all other affections of the nerves of sensation, are cured with equal facility by the same means. The Pills, from their direct operation upon the secretions, and through them upon the blood, may also be used with marked advantage in every instance where the Ointment is employed to remove the outward developments of disease, and fomentation of the parts affected with warm water, together with an occasional resort to warm drinks for the promotion of perspiration, are useful adjuncts in producing a speedy cure.

For all diseases of the muscles, nerves and glands, as well as for ulcers, bruises, eruptions, tumours, and scrofulous affections, I am satisfied that Holloway's Pills and Ointment are the only thorough and invariable specifics.—From the pen of an Old Settler.
