The End in Sight.

OTTAWA, June 26.—Hon. Mr. Fielding's resolution to borrow fifteen millions went through after some remarks by Hon. Mr. Foster.

The Crow's Nest railway was then taken up and discussed till one o'clock in the afternoon.

The iron bounties were then taken up, and later the house went into committee of supply on the vote for jubilee postage stamps.

Hon. Mr. Foster expressed regret that in this anniversary year the Government had given to a New York firm the contract to make the jubilee postage stamps, though the Canadian contract had not run out.

The end of the sesion is believed to be once more in sight. Last evening when the house met Sir Richard Cartwright asked Hon. Mr. Foster if he thought the House could get through its business to-day.

Hon. Mr. Foster said that he thought not, but he hoped it might be possible to complete it on Monday. This would enable prorogation to take place on Tuesday. The committee rose at 12.30.

Hon. Mr. Foster proposed to resume the Crow's Nest pass discussion and have Hon. Mr. Blair's further statement on it.

Hon. Mr. Blair said that he proposed to take time to reply to Mr. Foster's criticism.

Hon. Mr. Foster said that in that case prorogation was further away than it seemed earlier in the evening.

Hon. Mr. Blair said that he could not then go on and the House adjourned.

SUNNYSIDE,

AN AMERICAN OPINION.

The Sun Man Says the Sun Never Shone on a More Marvellous Sight.

The New York Sun devotes considerably over a page to a cabled description of the jubilee celebration in London. The story is introduced by a two column leader, which is in part as follows: "When a crowd of jubilee sightseers flung a well-dressed stranger into a fountain in Trafalgar square the other day because he ventured a remark that was slightly disparaging to Queen Victoria, they symbolized the spirit which has made today's celebration an event transcendent in all human annals. The intense personal loyalty of the British people to their Sovereign is the one fact above all others which this spectacle in the streets of London has impressed upon all beholders. It is easy to describe all else, the procession decorations and illuminations; but this stupendnous thing, this majestic homage of many millions, spoken in one mighty, inarticulate voice, cannot be put into words. I know nothing with which to compare it. It was not hero-worship. It was not even patriotism. It was more personal, more human than that. It was the deepest and warmest heart tribute to the womanliness of the Queen and the queenliness of the woman. Most significant of all, this spirit found its most fervent expression in what Lincoln loved to call the common people. All the pettiness and official muddling which made the preparations for the jubilee a scandal banished into nothingness when the masses, which still are the bone and sinew of England, got a chance to make their voice heard. Their voice, be it understood, and not the well bred applause and cheers of the occupants of ten-guinea seats, furnished the keynote of today's festival. The mighty roar from millions of throats never ceased from the moment the Queen left the palace until she was helped from her carriage at the end of the trying ordeal, three hours later.

But the jubilee was not simply and solely the Queen's as it should have been. While the celebration, first of all, was a personal tribute to the Sovereign, there was no lack of emphasis of the significance of the second great feature. This was the new Imperial spirit which has only recently had its birth. It took the form of a magnificent popular ovation to the representatives of the colonies, which was astonishing in its fervor and intensity, It was all the more ostentatious perhaps because there was a public impression that the official treatment of the visiting colonial troops was not as cordial as it should have been.

There was, therefore, a genuine popular rebuke in the tremendous welcome which London gave the colonial visitors along the whole six miles of the route. There was an opportunity to make this particularly striking in the first two miles from the palace to St. Paul's cathedral, where the colonial contingent of prime ministers and troops marched as a separate procession more than an hour in advance of the royal parade. The Queen herself received scarcely a more enthusiastic greeting. When her carriage arrived the vast crowds were already so hoarse from cheering that they could only give vent to a rough roar, which must have sounded strangely to her ears.

But it is as the greatest gathering of human beings the world has ever seen that Queen Victoria's jubilee will live in the memory of all those who participated in it and in the history of the race.

It was after the procession was finished that the people gave themselves up to light-hearted enjoyment. Then it was that the most wonderful sight of all was witnessed. The human throng that had been still, but not silent, for many hours, began to move. They no longer seemed to be composed of individuals. They were not reckoned in numbers. They were vast areas of humanity which became eddying tides flowing resistlessly here and there. London was like Venice. Her streets were canals, with nowhere a glimpse of the pavement, as these sluggish human streams ebbed and flowed, each drop to atom helpless to move save with the general current and rising up from it all one a ceaseless, voiceless murmur, not soothing like rippling water over rocks, nor majestic like the roar of an angry sea, but the restless, awsome intoning of a strange new energy, which beat upon one's eardrums until now, after many hours, it has become intolerable.

Not for one moment during nearly a hundred hours has London been silent, day or night. Jubilee throngs have filled the streets since Friday last. Many thousands of persons have not known a bed in all that time. They may have snatched naps occasionally in the parks or elsewhere, but they have celebrated the jubilee to the point of utter exhaustion. To-night, however, the crowds are greater than ever. I have no words of disparagement for this wonderful day in the wonderful history of this wonderful Empire. Answers which came within scarcely more than an hour from forty seats of government, over which the British flag floats, in every corner of the earth, to the Queen's message of thanks to her subjects, are sufficient to make the day memorable in human records. I, in common with thousands of other aliens, have watched men of every color and every creed marching loyally under the same flag, and I confess, without reserve and without envy, that it was the most marvellous sight the sun ever looked down upon.
