ELLEN'S DIARY

Old Tabby Settled Herself Cozily In The Old Chair

"Stars are the windows of heaven, where angels peep through" a radio voice sings nicely. And a September night, one still of summer, weaves its quiet night-spell over the length and breadth of the farmlands. It is soothing in its stillness, healing in its peace. In it we can forget all the little and larger concerns of our day, those annoyances, which harbored for any length of time are wearing on the spirit, and the disappointments, that after all, have their compensations, or may sooner or later, be overcome.

Tabby the aged cat, a wise lady - of - a - feline, eyes the couch already occupied, and in a second choice, settles herself cozily in the old armchair. James catches a nap, hands clasped on his chest, in a way that he has. He sleeps fitfully, for has he not something of importance to the farming on his mind? He delays thus his retiring for a time, to ascertain whether or not the restlessness of one of the cows in the near piggery may indicate only a change in the weather, or if as he said this evening, consulting the leaves of the calendar, "she could be making her bed."

"You might, Ellen," he suggests, blinking his eyes at the light, "close off that radio. I like peace" he smiles faintly, voice fading away. Lovely our day has been, laced with sunshine, ribboned about with a nice September wind. Today the work of the harvesting was continued, now quite out of sight of the cooks at this farm, the scene of it having been moved in the road to Rob's fields, and those at "the other farm" which adjoins his beyond.

"Now don't say that we are fresh out of sugar!" we exclaimed this morning looking into an empty container when we were about to prepare a dessert for dinner.

"Goody," Peter at an elbow beamed. "That means we will be going to the store."

Down the lane, we came presently with James at the wheel of the little truck, by the bridges, and up and past the house on the hill. Now the maples in the bush beyond the hilltop commence to be colorful. Last golden rods blossom in the fencerows, and the blue of the asters by the roadside, reflect the azure blue of the sky.

"I always like to go to the store," Peter offered happily.

"Well, if you have thoughts of buying pop and suchlike, you can just put it out of your mind," James said looking down at him, on the seat between us, rather sternly.

The corner - store is as always a friendly spot. If its wares have changed unbelievably up through the years, if staples can no longer be had "on draft" from cask or barrel, but are conveniently packaged, it is the same kindly shop. A smallish but knowing white dog, intriguingly spotted, meets you, a pet of mother - cat basks in the sun of a verandah and contentedly primping "for company."

"Now is that all, Ellen?" James questioned, about to gather up our buyings.

"All" we nodded.

He looked inquiringly at Peter who was wearing a sober expression. He smiled, Peter brightened.

"Was there something you were wanting, Dear?" he inquired.

We would wish for tomorrow - but shame on us, when these
