Some Wild Birds. A most extraordinary instance of the tameness of birds in unexplored forests is related by a writer in The National Geographic Magazine, describing a tour of exploration to the headwaters of the Saskatchewan.

As our horses were winding through a deep forest a bird appeared which resembled a pine bullfinch flitting from tree to tree and following us closely. Somewhat later it gave the most remarkable instance of tameness that I have ever seen. Having followed us for about two miles, it waited in a tree during the bustle and confusion of making camp, but in the afternoon, when all was quiet and some of our men were asleep, the bird became exceedingly familiar, walking on the ground near us and finally perching on our extended hands.

It was soon evident that the object of our visitor was to catch mosquitoes, which were hovering in swarms around our heads. It pecked at a ring on my hand, at our needles, and, in fact, any metal article. But the climax was reached when by accident the bird saw its own image in a small looking glass which lay on the ground. Then, with extended wings and open bill, it uttered cries of rage and pecked madly at the glass in which an enemy appeared.

Among the solitudes of mountain forests squirrels, finches and whistlers often show unusual confidence in man, but this particular instance is remarkable, because the bird would alight on our persons even after it had been momentarily, though gently, detained several times as a prisoner in my hand.
