De Gaulle Strikes Sharply At British Entry To ECM

By HAROLD KING

PARIS (Reuters) — President de Gaulle rejected Monday the United States offer of Polaris nuclear missiles for France and expressed strong doubts about Britain's attempt to enter the European Common Market.

De Gaulle told a press conference:

"I do not think anyone thinks we can now subscribe to The Bahamas agreement," which included the Polaris offer, and added it was not even "of current interest" to France.

President Kennedy made the offer to both France and Britain when he met Prime Minister Macmillan in The Bahamas last month.

De Gaulle did not slam the door on Britain joining the Common Market but he expounded at length his view that at the present time the British economic system with its world wide trade links and cheap food policy was incompatible with the system prevailing inside the Common Market.

REITERATES STAND

De Gaulle also reiterated his determination to build an independent French nuclear arm in spite of the Anglo-American agreement to create a multilateral NATO nuclear force.

"I repeat that France intends to have her own national defence," he said.

He said the French atomic force would have the "sombre and terrible capacity" of killing millions and millions of men.

On the subject of Britain's bid to join the Common Market, he stated the British agricultural system was incompatible with that of the continental Market members and that it was for Britain to find the answer.

Observers in Paris said his statement to 850 reporters crowded into the Elysee Palace banquet hall probably barred the way to a successful conclusion of the Brussels entry talks in the near future unless Britain came forward with an offer to start changing her farm system immediately.

Port City Of Dakar Is One Of Contrasts

By ANDREW BOROWIEC

DAKAR, Senegal (AP)—Modern civilization pours into West Africa through this port city of striking contrasts.

Black Senegalese women nurse their babies next to Paris-style shops. Towering buildings housing airline offices sprout in the heart of Dakar next to the sprawling Moslem district, smelling of squalor and spices.

Some 10,000 planes land or take off yearly at Dakar's Yoff airport, a link between Europe and Latin America and the main airline transit point in this part of the world.

Four thousand ships dock in Dakar's harbor, taking and discharging more than 50,000 passengers and 3,000,000 tons of cargo a year.

In white - walled government buildings, officials of newly independent Senegal work side by side with French experts.

At sundown, when neon lights go on and red-bereted French paratroopers on leave spill into the streets, Moslem men in their long, loose robes bow in the dust to pray, faces east, toward Mecca.

PARIS OF AFRICA

Dakar is the Paris of Africa, where shops sell perfumes or mink stoles-at twice the Paris price.

Of 400,000 persons who live in Dakar, 30,000 are Europeans—mostly French who constitute Senegal's economic backbone. A total of 45,000 Frenchmen live in Senegal.

Independence from France has not changed drastically the country's relationship with its former master. President Leopold Sedar Senghor describes France as 'our old and trusted friend."

Some 5,000 French troops, including a crack paratroop regiment, are stationed here. French officers train the newly formed Senegalese army.

A university is entirely staffed by French professors. Out of about 1,500 students this year, around 400 are French. The rest have come from all over French-speaking Africa.

MORE LITERATE

Under Senghor's leadership, Senegal is playing a leading role in efforts to force African unity. Although its natural resources are not so important as those of Gabon or Guinea, the country has more trained officials and craftsmen with a higher literacy rate.

Senegal's per capita income is $183 a year—twice Tunisia's. The population is slightly more than 3,000,000; it is 83 per cent Moslem, the rest Christian.

The capital's exotic setting and color of crowds in its sunlit streets cover considerable misery and unemployment.

In the squalid Medina area one out of every five men works. A highly developed tribal responsibility system keeps most of the others alive.

"In the Medina every man who works supports a dozen persons," a Senegalese official said.

The custom of helping relatives and "tribal brothers" exists even on the ministerial level. Some foreigners complain that the system does not particularly encourage people to work.

PRINCE CHARLES BEGINS SKIING

TARASP, Switzerland (Reuters) — Prince Charles of England had his first skiing lesson here and proved a apt pupil, according to instructor Gisep Heinrich.

The 14-year-old son of Queen Elizabeth learned to walk on skis, do a "kick turn" and made his first run down a slight incline. He didn't fall once in a two-hour lesson, Heinrich said.

Charles, who arrived here Thursday on his first trip to Switzerland, is staying in a modernized farmhouse owned by his uncle, Prince Georg of Hanover. He is expected to stay 10 days or two weeks.

The stocky, dark - haired Heinrich, who speaks only a little English, talked to Charles in German. The translator was Princess Margaret, Scottish - born wife of his host, Prince Ludwig of Hesse.

She appealed to press photographers to keep away from the prince while he is learning.

"Be fair," she said. "This is the first time in his life he has been on skis."
