ELLEN'S DIARY Schooldays Here Again After Glorious Summer

And now the long twilight of early-summer days has shortened, the pensive glow of the daisies gone from the meadows; the haying is over, Fair Week a low dream and the interval which is the children's vacation open. Schooldays are here again. So swiftly it has passed, every hour of all those enchanted vacation-days. Yet how memorable is that holiday season, giving as it does freedom from the study and confinement of the schoolroom's four walls to the delight of the open spaces of the farm. Then the fields and the farm paths are theirs, the copses and streams.

Ours had their work too. But on these farms there is always that pleasant foregathering to it of the many hands young and old, which serves to make every task lighter. We recall now the weeding... and the haying, young steps brisk about, shoes, boots polished to a sheen from its contact. We think too of the laughs we heard at noontime and supper, infectious in their happiness and so good to hear in this, a too-soon age.

"Now let's get to work! We'll have our laughs when we get these potatoes gathered up" we recall a farmer-helper advise the pickers one afternoon in those times of which James speaks now somewhat wistfully as "the years we grew seed."

And to hear him speak of these is to look back across the valley of the years, the depths and the heights and find that of all his vicissitudes now only its pleasantries remain. And in this afterglow we see not the friendly tractors of now but the friendly, even loved team of then and James as at the digging. Expression (Can we not see it! And no slyer then in his crown but it brown as the eyes were. And the heart beating young) a little anxious that the digger should enter the row at such a level as would stir the tubers. And then with a first row turned out gleamingly white to the sunshine we had a common query: "Do you think the crop is as good - or better - than last year's?" For always much depended on this cash crop
