Marrying Mark

Valerie wondered what she had been doing up to now and decided that it must be the "nice" that made it different.

"I would love you to think of me as a mother," she said confidently. Valerie shivered a little. She stopped almost immediately and came to me with your small joys and woes. It was with bitter irony for your lovely mother to die, to leave her home and her little girl and be hurried into the darkness.

The shivering began again and this time it went on and on. It seemed to be inside where nobody could see.

"My father says she hasn't—I mean gone—into darkness," said Valerie uncertainly. "He says she was really her thoughts and they couldn't die because she took them with her."

"What a very strange idea," said Mrs. Radding. She looked across at Gilda, but Gilda was smoking and flicking the pages of a smart magazine she had got from the library on her way from the lunch table. "Of course as to that, darling, we don't know. Not one returns to tell us of the road," said dear Omar says. Unless of course, you believe in spiritualism. But we do know what has happened to all the lovely things she left behind her. Or do we? Gilda's eyes lifted, flickered briefly and dropped again. "Her jewels, for instance—"

"They're in a place—a deposit, or something—I think in a bank—"

Valerie remembered hearing Lee Dagnall say this when he read the will.

"They would be," said Mrs. Radding. She reached out and took Valerie's thin little hand into the vast softness of her own.

Valerie felt it coming and braced herself. She wondered if people forgave you if something burst inside and you screamed in their faces.

"I loved your dear mother. It seems curious your—your father hasn't given some token of hers to her intimate friends."

Valerie thought of Elise and Shirley and the will. But something told her not to tell.

The sweetest thought has just this minute come to me. Gilda's eyes flickered again. "Dear Ellen's sable coat. Not the ermine or the broadtail. I have ermine, and the broadtail was beginning to rub. I noticed it the last time I saw dear Ellen wear it. But the sable. I wonder if you know it? I wonder if you wouldn't love me to have it to remember my friend—"

Valerie looked at Mrs. Radding's bulk which overflew the little seat they were on.

"My mother was not very large, I mean around," she offered uncertainly. Mrs. Radding's face grew even redder. Over in her corner Gilda made a curious choking sound without raising her eyes.

"But don't you see, darling, Gilda could wear it for me. My little Gilda. Then I should always have it near me. Something dear Ellen had worn—something personal, intimate, to keep always—"

This was a brand new problem. But the terrible day had been filled with things that had never happened before. Valerie wondered frantically what to say. It was so simple when it came.

"I'll ask my father." But even before Mrs. Radding answered she knew it wasn't the right thing.

The dowager got up as suddenly as she was able, and faced Valerie.

"I hope you will do nothing of the kind," she said crisply. "How can you be so inconceivably dull? Gilda have you forgotten your appointment with the hairdresser?"

"I seldom keep appointments twenty-four hours ahead of time," said Gilda, laying down her magazine. She held her long ebony holder with its half smoked cigarette, and got lazily to her feet. "But I'm quite ready to go, if that's what you mean. Taking candy from a baby isn't my idea of sport. This was your bright idea, remember, not mine."

Mrs. Radding's maternally vanished with her manners. She looked witheringly at Gilda, and started out of the drawing-room. The velvet hangings just stirred and a moment later Chiltern opened the front door for them, stepping out to call their car.

"Was I right or not?" he asked later in the servants sitting room. He refused to say anything more, and Mrs. Banwood frowned indignantly. His "What I could tell if I would," expression irritated her almost beyond bearing.
