NOTICE

Gentlemen:

As there are practically no hogs offering now, we have decided to discontinue packing Wednesday, May 31st, for this season.

With the warmer weather we would suggest that you be very careful handling hogs, especially the heavier ones. They should be allowed to cool well before shipping, and if very heavy it would perhaps be wise to have them split down the back on the outside.

We will be buying again as usual next Fall.

Yours truly,

BED sheets and counterpanes—bath towels and bath mats that you dread to clean on wash day.

Just let them soak themselves perfectly clean with Rinso—the new scientific form of Soap in granules. Do not put the Rinso direct from the package into the tub. Make the Rinso liquid first.

Mix half a package of Rinso in a little cool water until it is like cream. Then add two quarts of boiling water and when the froth subsides put it in a tub of cool or lukewarm water and you will have enough for a batch of clothes. If the clothes are extra soiled, use more Rinso.

A STORY Chapter 50

The girl had often wondered about this mysterious "husband" she had a natural curiosity and a great deal of sympathy for Gloria when she thought of it.

So she kept still now, hoping her friend would go on. So as not to disturb her, she kept on with her writing, carefully making up the blank book with days and dates for months ahead.

"He thinks he may come over to America," Gloria went on. "Is he—I mean, I didn't know he was away." Pan murmured.

"The last I saw of him and of Europe was when I left him," Gloria said. "And I hope I never see a foreign country again as long as he's living there."

She was quite changed when Pan glanced at her. She looked about her mouth, which had hardened into a tight line. The fine wrinkles about the eyes were plain now, though they were usually hardly noticeable, her skin was so firm and clear. But Gloria was the curious sort that could age ten years in as many minutes, and then could throw them off as easily as she could toss her head, under the exhilaration of excitement.

She wanted to talk now—the fire, the comfort of the couch, the warmth of the rug Pan had thrown over her knees, the quiet little list she drew her on to confidences.

"The odd thing was that yesterday I passed the minister that married us."

"He stopped me and asked me how Frank was? Fancy, it was like raising a ghost! I couldn't hurt him, so I said he was well. I've no doubt it's quite true. He asked where we were, and I said that Frank was in Paris on business just now."

She stopped and laughed a little. "He probably is, but his business would be mostly with some of the Folies Bergere girls."

"When were you married?" Pan ventured to ask.

"Ten years ago—when I was old enough to know better. But Frank was awfully charming then. He was in the Consular Service and we went to Tunis, Oh, my dear, golden sun and a burning sapphire sky, houses painted pink and white and green, and every sort of gay color—and such a garden! You can't imagine how beautiful a tropical garden can be—Her voice trailed off. Gloria began talking spasmodically, starting sentences half finishing them, staring into the fire while her eyes saw the terraced gardens, the dazzling white roads, the shaded courtyards of the houses, the smart young men and woman who wintered in Northern Africa.

She told Pan stories of the gay irresponsible life there, young men who loafed and flirted, young men who slaved for promotion "as much as one can in such a climate," she added.

"And the moonlight! It was too much for poor Frank's head which was never strong when there was a pretty woman around. I did such a silly thing the first time I found him out—we'd been married five months, I was giving a huge dinner that night, and there was a striped awning near a clump of flowering bushes. He'd disappeared with the most beautiful guest, they looked so silly, caught spooning like school boy and girl. But I fainted and he never forgave me."

"But—how awful! Pan was genuinely shocked. "How brutal!"

"No, quite right," Gloria answered, her face a little hard again.

"There's a sort of code, a sense of good sportsmanship, that applies to everything. I shouldn't have given them away by showing

My surprise; I mean I should have the people away as soon as I new who was sitting under the awning or, if they were discovered, should have laughed it off. It was made that mistake again."

"But we quarreled violently for months, and he began drinking a lot and resigned—or else was asked to; he was drinking entirely too much, we had a lot of stormy scenes about that too—he was so unjust at times, and I wept or else aged."

"Then—well of course what followed was inevitable. My baby was born dead, it wasn't even seven months—and he said it was my fault for getting into such temper. Once, being quite it up after party, he told me I'd done it on purpose. I never forgave him that."

She talked on, while Pan sat quietly, too absorbed to go on with her self imposed secretarial work, or sensitive little heart fairly brim with sympathy for her friends.

"Frank had left the diplomatic service, either of himself or by request and they had sailed for France."

"Bobby was with the Consulate, he stayed on, but joined us later at Cannes," Gloria said. "Poor Frank had an attack of conscience so he was so awfully ill, and took me down the Nile for my health. We stopped at Cannes in the Springs, came back here for the Summer. Frank had to get work of some sort, we were running out of money."

"What did he do?" Pan asked.

"What work? His work was mainly coaxing funds out of his nether. It took him all summer, but he did it—I found out later, by saying we were to have another child, which wasn't true—and that he had to take me away to some quiet place for my health—she never knew what caused the first catastrophe. I was miserable—"

"She paused, laughed, and made a remark that was the keynote to her character. "I was so miserable here was nothing to do but laugh about it."
