MARY HAWORTH

Shock Left A Deep Scar Youth Still Suffers

Dear Mary Haworth: I am a boy in Hong Kong, age 18, and if there is something wrong with my English, please excuse me. I found interest in love when I was 14. The first girl I chose was a slim, active, beautiful girl having not enough maturity of character. As we had no knowledge of life at that time, we both did very wrong things, of course. Once I invited her out to a movie and she declined. Very simple, actually, but I felt great injury to my self-esteem and so for the next full month, I fell into a state of depression. Why should she treat me that way? Had I done something to make her angry?

Later, when we were friends again, I asked her to a dancing party and she said: "Please excuse me, for I have no time that night." I could not argue that. But when the evening came, she joined the party, bringing a partner with her. What was her reason for this? Was there some mistake?

This anguished me, leaving a deep scar on my heart, but her past consolation to me had become a flame, which I have endured for four long years. She has many boy friends and pen pals. Is she a play girl?

I know I am not less handsome than other boys; and also have good manners. Why didn't she love me? Will you tell me what is really love? Please explain who's wrong and who's right. Goodbye, B.S.

GROWS MORE THAN OTHER

Dear S.S.: You have a good command of the English language. You communicate very well in it.

Now, I shall try to shed some light on your problems of long lasting unhappiness associated with a girl whose actions you haven't understood.

It is my impression that the girl drifted away from you mostly because she continued to grow socially, after you first loved her and did everything wrong when you both knew so little of life. And in this time, while she has kept on growing, you have remained much as you were, four years ago.

If you will think back on your way of life, and compare it to hers, I imagine you will recognize that you are a lonelier person than she is; naturally more shy and reserved; not nearly so cordial and diligent in making new friends.

She is the outgoing type, no doubt; and very likely she took the initiative in winning your heart.

FAILED TO ACT AGE

Why did she decline your invitation to a movie? Well, who knows? Maybe she was flirting with another boy behind your back at the time, and taking care to indicate that she wasn't tied to you. Or maybe her parents or guardian had instructed her to see less of you, and more of other young people—as a safeguard against losing her head, or her honor.

Or possibly she had begun to tire of your attentions, due to a surfeit of wrong-doing, and felt the only fair move was to discourage your interest, and accept no more favors. In any case, among friends there must be a margin of mutual independence, with no hard feelings when one turns down another's suggestions. Like it or not, she had a right to say "no" if she chose; and your sulking was a very immature, inappropriate reaction, that did you no good in her estimation.

A sociable self-confident boy, similarly tried, would have been back again courting the elusive girl, within a few days, if he really felt that his heart was invested. You just didn't act your age in that instance.

LOVE DESIRES GOOD

For the rest, the dancing party episode indicates that she was using finesse to keep you at a distance; and I advise you to drop the matter there. Let her go; stop looking back. Come out of your shell and merge with humanity; be everybody's friend, using your pain as a stimulus to growth.

To define true love: It is the desire to give fullness of life. It is that state wherein another's satisfaction and security are as important to you as your own well-being. M.H.
