

West German Cabinet Clash Cool Nuclear Treaty Hope

By CARL HARTMAN
BONN (AP)—A clash inside Chancellor Kurt Georg Kiesinger's new West German coalition government has dampened American hopes of a treaty with the Soviet Union to halt the spread of nuclear weapons. The winners, at least for the moment, are Defense Minister

State Secretary Dean Rusk, who has been holding out in negotiations with Moscow for the kind of "open door" clause in the treaty that Schroeder and his friends want. Under former Chancellor Ludwig Erhard, when Schroeder was foreign minister, they stood for a West German right of "co-ownership" in something such as the now-abandoned Multilateral Nuclear Force.

Out of solidarity with their West German allies, American leaders feel they cannot give up this clause altogether, even though they badly want the treaty with Moscow. The picture would be different if the West Germans were voluntarily to say they want no share in handling nuclear weapons.

The Russians also have an "open door" clause in their German agreement. They insist the door should be slammed on any West German participation in an actual nuclear force. This is not what American officials say. To the question of whether the Russians are in fact set to give up this clause altogether, the answer is no. The Russians are in fact set to give up this clause altogether, the answer is no.

The first stage of a vast revision of wholesale prices takes effect Jan. 1. The revision is to make prices reflect market conditions and give managers a yardstick to find out how plants can operate profitably. Wholesale prices are to be increased by an over-all average of 20 per cent, with turnover taxes to be slashed accordingly. Rumors are prevalent that a lot of retail prices will go up in the wake of the wholesale increase.

Jan. 1 also marks the beginning of "denervitization" (deleveling) which puts an end to the wage system of Stalinist times. In the past, anyone who worked harder than the others in his factory just caused an increase of the working norms. In the future, hard work is to pay off. Up to now, 1,300 plants—most of them small—have been wadded out. Another 1,400 face shutdowns during the next five years. A total of almost 100,000 workers of a total work force of 6,000,000—will be "freed" for other jobs.

More realistic pricing, work incentives and greater autonomy for the managers of state-owned enterprises are among pivots of the new system, conceived after the economy suffered a slump in 1963. Things may get worse for many of the 14,000,000 Czechoslovaks before they improve. Lower living standards, layoffs and even a shrinkage in economic growth may be in store for a time.

While Brandt was in Paris, Helmut Schmidt, leading the Social Democratic party in the Bundestag, demanded that the government renounce nuclear-sharing for West Germany. In this he was joined by spokesmen for the Free Democrats, the smaller opposition party. There apparently is a majority for this viewpoint in the Bundestag but under present circumstances it may not be able to make its will felt.

Brandt returned from Paris with a quite different position from the one he is reported to have taken in last Monday's cabinet meeting. He repeated to the Bundestag what up to now has been the arguments of its diplomatic cards and the whole question of nuclear-sharing is a "theoretical problem" anyhow. If Moscow saw it that way, there might be less trouble about a treaty. But the prospects now are that the disarmament conference due to convene in Geneva in February still will find the West German stand a formidable obstacle.

Sweeping Economic Reform Forecast In Czechoslovakia

PRAGUE (AP)—A sweeping economic reform which Western observers judge to be one of the boldest in the Soviet orbit is just around the corner in Czechoslovakia—with all its potential benefits and hardships. After heavy-handed centralist planning that caused years of stagnation, the reform seems a step toward putting the economy on healthier feet. More realistic pricing, work incentives and greater autonomy for the managers of state-owned enterprises are among pivots of the new system, conceived after the economy suffered a slump in 1963. Things may get worse for many of the 14,000,000 Czechoslovaks before they improve. Lower living standards, layoffs and even a shrinkage in economic growth may be in store for a time.

CONTRACT BRIDGE

By R. JAY BECKER

This being so, declarer turns his attention to the possibility of a 4-1 club division. It is this type of thinking that is associated with the term safety play. Declarer does not assume a normal break but an abnormal one, and he then attempts to cater not only to the expected division but the unexpected as well.

He sees that if East has four clubs, regardless of their composition, the contract cannot be made. He dismisses this case from further consideration because nothing can be done about it.

He then assumes that West has four clubs. This occurs whenever East has the singleton Q, J, 8 or 5. Where East has the singleton Q, J, or 5, again the contract is doomed. The defenders have two sure club tricks and nothing can be done.

What South finally does is concentrate on those 4-1 divisions he can control so that he loses only one club trick. These consist of the hands where East has the singleton 8 or 5.

Accordingly, South wins the spade lead with the ace and plays the two of clubs. This turns out to be the winning play in the actual hand. When West covers with the jack, dummy takes the king and returns a low club to the seven.

This play finishes off West, regardless of what he does. He cannot defeat the contract.

Safety plays are a separate law unto themselves. They vary so much from one hand to another that it is next to impossible to enumerate or codify them all. The best way of learning to deal with safety plays is not by trying to memorize them, but rather by trying to understand why, how and when they are used.

Examine the club holding in this hand. Declarer sees there can be no difficulty making three notrump if the clubs are void 3-2. He simply gives up a club in such case and makes nine tricks consisting of four clubs, two spades, a heart and two diamonds.
