Chapter XI

Having rallied from the shock of his encounter with Miss Matilda McCabe, Tillman L. Hill took stock of the situation. The Ocean Princess was beyond reach. Malda was aboard, Simms Waring was aboard. Why not capitalize the combination.

For the newspapers he issued a "covering" item, stating that Miss Malda Linn was visiting relatives in Ohio for a few days. He then sent this wireless to Simms. Suggest you authorize announcement before return stop wire me after landing.

T. L. H. Externals were important to Mr. Waring. Hence the inadequacies of his wardrobe kept him for the most part in seclusion. Only after the decks were dim and fairly empty did he modestly edge out for an evening stroll. He was hoping to see Malda. Before adopting the Hill strategy, upon which he thought he could improve, he must consult her.

It was a long wait before she appeared at the door and caught his signal. With no enthusiasm she accepted his suggestion that they find a retired spot. "You've no business to be here at all, Simms," she said severely.

"What do you want me to do? Jump off and swim home?"

"No-o-o. But I don't see--"

"Malda, I've just had a wireless from Hill."

"What's his trouble? Besides me, of course."

"He's giving out our engagement for publication." This was a trail balloon. It got an instant and unfavorable reaction.

"He isn't! When?"

"Any day now. Tomorrow perhaps."

"Did you put him up to it?"

"No. But I'm all for it."

"Well, I'm all against--" she checked herself. The atmosphere magically cleared. "That's swell."

Simms made a hopeful grab at her. Side-stepping with an alertness suggestive of practice, she halted him with a dramatically outthrust hand. "Don't touch me," she commanded in tones to match the gesture.

"What do you mean don't touch?"
