RICE POINT W. I.

A very pleasant evening was spent at the home of the president, Mrs. John B. MacDonald, when the members gathered to make a quilt for the Red Cross and discuss any necessary business for the month of April.

It was decided to donate $5.00 to the Red Cross and collect in the district.

The secretary was asked to write for a box of assorted cards.

The members were asked to bring their woollens to the next meeting, to be sorted and prepared for shipment, to be made into blankets.

The government grant of $2.50 was received by the Institute.

The monthly meeting of the Home and School Association was held on Wednesday evening, April 18th, with 18 members present. Mrs. Edmond M. Gaudet, Vice President of the Association presiding. The minutes of the previous meeting were read by the Secretary, Mr. E. J. Arsenault. Mrs. James Arsenault and Mrs. Arthur Pitre were appointed to visit the school during the month of May. It was also decided to purchase at least ten new desks immediately. A short demonstration was given by the pupils of Grades VII, VIII, IX, X, and XI. An interesting and instructive talk was delivered by the teacher who said that boys and girls should not leave school until they had obtained their sixteenth year. Among those who voiced their opinions were Mr. Ben J. Pitre, Dominic Desfoches and Mrs. Edmond Gaudet. The meeting closed with the singing of "Hail Heavenly Queen."

Two First Aid classes were brought to a close during the week of April 16. A Junior class of 17 pupils, Grade V to Grade VIII; a Senior class of ten adults. The Junior class was taught in the afternoon and the Standard in the evenings on two evenings per week. Mr. P. A. Arsenault was the instructor and was assisted by Mr. Edward J. Arsenault. The tests were held on Friday, April 19, with Mrs. Ray Handrahan, teacher at Christopher's Cross, as examiner. She was assisted by Mrs. Eldershaw of Tignish.

CRESCENT CARNIVAL
 FRANCES PARKISON KEYES

Patty led the way, followed by Raoul with Stella in his arms and Louis with the first consignment of bags. As Raoul put Stella carefully down on the bed, Patty gave a quiet order. "That'll be all. Louis, you may serve breakfast for the rest of us right away." Then, as the servant left the room she said, still very quietly, "Do you think I'd better try to undress her, Raoul? Or shall we just take off her shoes and leave her?"

"I think we might just take off her shoes. I'll just scribble a little note and stick it here on the bedside table, so she'll see it when she wakes up."

He extracted from his pocket a small pad and began to write hastily. Patty went out of the room in the same quiet way she had entered it, while he was still writing.

Dear Stella:

I really got quite a kick out of having you go to sleep in my arms on the way up here. Can't we call an armistice for the next forty-eight hours? I'll be polite if you will. Either you're more completely exhausted than's healthy for anyone, or else you must have taken a pretty stiff sedative, which was slow in getting in its lethal work, to help you through your plane trip. Either way, somebody ought to scold you, but I won't—not at present, anyway.

Yours,
 Raoul.

Stella, reluctantly rousing herself several hours later and catching sight of this missive propped against the thermos jar as she sat up, half-dazed and half-startled, read it with equally conflicting feelings. Suddenly, instead of feeling annoyed, she felt shy, for the first time in her life. She was willing to be polite and amicable; she could not restrain a passing pang over the suppressed "desires of the flesh". But she did not want to see Raoul, or anyone, right away. She wanted to stay in her room (this room) alone.

unpacking and saw the quantity and quality of Stella's belongings. Jezebel had finally been obliged to leave her, to help with the preparations for the party, and Stella threw the door open herself to find Raoul standing on the threshold. "I hope you're rested. We've been sorry not to have you with us, but I realized you were all in and I explained to the others. Patty wants to know if it will be convenient to come into the drawing room now, though. There are a few details she wants to explain to you before the company comes. The Bishop's here already and the kid's been brought downstairs. Gosh, but he really is a world-beater! You never saw such muscle on a baby. Come along and have a good look at him. You'll be proud of your godson."

The baptism was finished and Patty was holding the baby. The guests were crowding around her and Drew to congratulate them. But Raoul had seen Stella trembling. He was guiding her firmly across the entrance hall to the library. Almost grimly, he indicated an easy chair and told her to sit there while he went for champagne. When he returned, it was not only with a couple of glasses but also with a bottle imbedded in a silver ice bucket, all neatly arranged on a spacious tray. "I'm extremely suspicious about the number of square meals you're consuming regularly," he remarked, handing her a glass. "Now you'll drink this champagne and then you'll go into the drawing room and sing the aria from Louise. Come on, Stella, turn your face around."

"I'm sorry, Raoul. But you said yourself we'd reached the end of the road, more than a year and a half ago, and since then you've fallen in love with someone else."

"I said— And what did you say, to goad me into it? Plenty, and you know it. I never wanted to marry but one girl in my life, and that's you. I said, turn your face around, Stella."

Stella slept very late again Sunday morning. As she thrust her feet into her slippers, she saw a scrap of paper lying on the floor near her bed, which had evidently been slipped under the door. She knew it was from Raoul before she tore it open.

Hello, honey:

I'm off quail hunting for the day with Drew, at Jim Hymel's plantation. However, I'll see you tonight and we'll talk about weddings and things like that.

Gall had to start back to New Orleans this morning. He left good-bye for you. I think Patty, with her usual intuition, has already guessed that we've decided
