

Bad Weather May Rob Fishermen Of Harvest

Poor visibility, rough ice and contrary winds, may yet rob North Shore fishermen of the opportunity to reap a seal harvest, valued as high as $300,000.

A change in the wind direction Saturday apparently moved the valuable herd, estimated between 25,000 and 40,000, beyond the reach of the North Rustico fishermen and farmers who had spent considerable time equipping their dories and other light craft with runners.

By this means they had hoped to transport the seal pelts to land. However, although fog and mist obscured the view, it was still possible to hear the mammals barking on Saturday, and several men felt their way across two miles of the treacherous in-shore ice to where a group of four or five herds were located.

Emmett Gallant, manager of the North Rustico Canning Company, who was with the party said that they were able to kill about 20 of the young seals (harps), but the problem of getting the pelts ashore proved to be a big one, as each pelt weighed in the vicinity of 40 pounds.

Runner-equipped dories would be useless on such rough ice, he said, adding that in his opinion the larger part of the seal herd had been carried some distance to the east.

A Charlottetown fur buyer concurred with this observation. "If the floe should come ashore, it will probably do so in the vicinity of Tracadie or farther East," he said.

The seal herd arrived off P. E. I.'s north coast sometime last Monday. Thomas Doyle, whose home is near the shore in the Cavendish area reported that he had heard the seals "barking" Monday night, but attributed the unusual noise to the movement of the off-shore ice pack. It was not until Wednesday that the herd was first sighted.

Lined 100 carloads of sightseers along the coast road yesterday in the hope of viewing the huge herd, an unusual sight in this latitude.

Princess And Pianist Delay Engagement

STOCKHOLM ZAP — Princess Margaretha of Sweden and Robin Douglas-Home, once a jazz pianist in a London bar, have decided to postpone their engagement, a royal communique indicated Sunday.

The communique said the 25-year-old suitor of the tall, fair-haired granddaughter of King Gustaf will leave for London Monday afternoon but intends to return this spring. The princess is 23.

An announcement of an engagement had been widely expected after Douglas-Home flew here five days ago and was formally introduced to the king by Prince Bertil, an uncle of Margaretha.

The newspaper Aftonbladet said the postponement does not mean the romance between the princess and Douglas-Home is on the rocks.

The paper said the young couple were "advised to think it over but they have decided on the postponement voluntarily." No reason was given.
