

ELLEN'S DIARY

A Dwelling Becomes Home With A Housewife's Touch

So pretty a morning we came to, mild and clean-spread. Presently the snowflakes dripped, and the sun looked in toward the south, over the eastern rim of hills. Soon too the snowflakes passed. And Mack noting this, as we suspected also did other lads of the area, smiled happily. They would get off to rink. The schoolboys' hockey games would be a pleasant feature of the morning. He hurried back to the stables to help round up the chores. Freshly white today's fields were, and velvety dark the trees spruce and fir, and the bare boles and traceries of branches of the others against it. And damp the snow that had fallen. If there should happen to be a snap of frost with this thawing, what grand educating down the slope there would be! We offered to Alex and Peter, out about the yards with their sleds. And we came to the round of our day: to the little duties, the seemingly endless homely things that go with the role of the housewife - those which have been here to do, since Eden, using those gifts which are inherently hers. Her hands leave those touches which contribute to order and good taste - a certain beauty in the home. She moves a chair to a nice setting straightens a window-shade, hangs curtains, arranges pictures on a wall; no great paintings, perhaps, a reproduction she enjoys, or only a print cut from a magazine to add interest and color to her room. She makes cushions for chair or couch, mind and fingers active as the fashions and stitches the pretty covers, it may be from bright bits and pieces left over from her sewing. And the dwelling becomes a home to be remembered because of the touch of her hand. And what of the bakings today? A pie perhaps? Yes, of last cooking - apples from the cellar. And how a cake, first weighing the tastes of the household. A pan of rolls maybe, working into the dough the sunbeams that fell across the bowl in which you mixed them? Working in an egg for added nourishment, a pinch of extra sugar or salt, for after all, this is often the magic which makes a food more tasteful. And as you prepared them with a light hand for the pan and the list rising, you wondered with whom besides the family, these would be shared. Kin, friend or stranger: the angel entertained unaware? Someone whose coming would bring you and yours a happy chuckle; one to talk shop; or perhaps one who in sharing a difficulty with you, would find that in talking it over, it had lightened considerably, or indeed had vanished away. Now another week goes - a winter one, and pleasant. Of it, we remember, we lived one day at a time. This we do, assured, confident, that as we proceed only step by step, "the way is opened before us." One considering this bids us: "Charge not thyself with the weight of a year. Child of the Master, faithful and dear; Choose not the cross for the coming week, For that is more than he bids us seek. Bend not thine arms for tomorrow's load, Thou mayest leave that to thy gracious God. 'Dally' only He saith to thee, 'Take up the cross and follow Me.'"

MARY HAWORTH

Girl Baffled By Behaviour Of Friend Over Holidays

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: I am a girl, 19. Last summer I met a nice young man, now 21. At first I didn't like him especially, but as time passed, I began to care a lot for him. He goes to college and one night just before the holidays the telephoned from the local bus station to let me know that he was in town. I must admit that I took a very unconcerned attitude on the phone. I acted this way because he hadn't answered the last letter I had sent him. He apologized for not having written and said that he would see me the following day. He never showed up. Although this worried me very much I didn't inquire; nor did I write him; nor did he write me, after he returned to school. I haven't heard from him at all. It really broke my heart that he didn't stop by for a Christmas visit. Please tell me if I should write to him, to ask why he did not come over? Or should I let things stay as they are? I would like very much to know if we are still friends. Beginning this month I will be a freshman at the college he is attending. V.A. DEAR V. A.: The boy's behavior as described indicates that he is disposed to like you usually, but is on the defensive against the possibility of your casting him in the role of One-and-Only. Very likely he got the true meaning of your "unconcerned" pitch on the phone. He sensed that he was in the doghouse as a result of not answering your latest letter, a state of affairs which, to his way of thinking, would indicate that you were pushing in the direction of wanting an "understanding". Or, in other words, of wanting to get serious, for the time being, at least. In placing the call, he may have anticipated a gladder welcome than you gave him. And in saying he would see you the following day, he could have been loudly echoing an idea he had in mind before your stand-offish attitude with him. Or he may have been improving a graceful exit - lines, wherewith to ease off the phone to avoid getting involved in your sarily "hurt" mood. In any case it is obvious that, after he had hung up, he decided it was more comfortable for him to stay out of your way. Hindsight is the most elementary form of wisdom someone has said. And from this distance, it is easy to see that you should have greeted his phone call cheerily, dismissed his apologies for failing to write with sympathetic feminine clucks about his busy burdened life on campus, suggested that he stop by the house to say hello to the

Tasty Sunday Breakfast Is Savored At Leisure

With breakfast from Monday through Friday almost a meal-scramble in many homes, leisurely week-end breakfasts become real treats. For breakfast tomorrow, we suggest this menu with a new kind of pancake. Sunday Breakfast Baked or Fried Sausage Links Buttermilk Oatmeal Pancakes with Butter and Maple or Maple-Blended Syrup Bowl of Assorted Seasonable Fruits Choice of Coffee, Tea, Milk. Note: Instead of syrup, you might enjoy warm stewed plums; or peaches; or canned blueberries as a change with the pancakes. Why are the assorted whole fruits served last? Because everyone is relaxed and will take time to enjoy them. Even more important, whole fruits clean the teeth naturally and leave the mouth in an alkaline condition - the enemy of tooth decay. Measurements level; Recipes of the Week BUTTERMILK OATMEAL PANCAKES 2 c. buttermilk 1 tsp. baking soda 1/2 c. uncooked rolled oats (quick or old-fashioned) 1 egg, beaten 2 tsp. melted margarine or cooking oil 1 c. pancake mix Combine, buttermilk soda and oats in mixing bowl. Let stand 2 min. Add remaining ingredients; mix until just combined enough to make a batter. For 2 1/2" to 3" pancakes, use 1 tsp. batter each, pouring batter onto hot, lightly oiled griddle. Bake (fry) to golden brown, turning only once. Serve with butter and warm maple or maple-blended syrup.
