

ELLEN'S DIARY

Eerie Spooks, Goblins Are Abroad This Night

It will be dim tonight, because this is "the dark of the moon." A convenient darkness, we think this will be, for all the pixie folk who will be abroad. We shall be catching glimpses of some of those at Alderley, both in the flesh and in fancy.

As we come to a verandah, maybe to watch the day opening the spillovers there on the hill-top to allow the dusk to chill the magic flow, we shall see the latter. There in the leaves at the foot of the lawn will come a sudden rustic in the silence - where? Ah! Here! Followed by Peter's kittens play in a little stirring this will be such as comes in the poplars' leaves on a breathless summer day; a quick movement without cause. And in a searching glance, we shall spy a little goblin of fellow there, with pointed ears and pointed cap, grinning an impish grin. His clothing will be so much the shade of his surroundings we should never have noticed him, were it not for the sheen of his eyes. Like your diamonds they will be... And now that we continue to stare, we shall make out his shape, for he is frozen there the way we have seen a covey of little partridges or turkey poult in the fields freeze at a hint of danger. Not moving a muscle. Keeping very still, and not so that others who shall make out, indeed in the very same way, there is a little white man, crouched low to the ground. And the twilight will be falling, spreading its purple shadings over all. We hear the voices from the barns where the choring will be in progress. Perhaps here James call in a lagging cow from the field to nurse her calf. And the echo will not be like that of other evenings. It will ring hollowly. There will be in it that mysterious quality which belongs alone to fancy.

And then we shall hear a sound like that of a far jet passing. Yet searching the sky, we shall find no sign of any flying trail blazed there against the evening blue. But what? "Ah ha!" we shall chuckle. Because we have seen her again. What? Here! Followed by Peter's kittens play in a little stirring this will be such as comes in the poplars' leaves on a breathless summer day; a quick movement without cause. And in a searching glance, we shall spy a little goblin of fellow there, with pointed ears and pointed cap, grinning an impish grin.
