Passing Of An Old Ship.

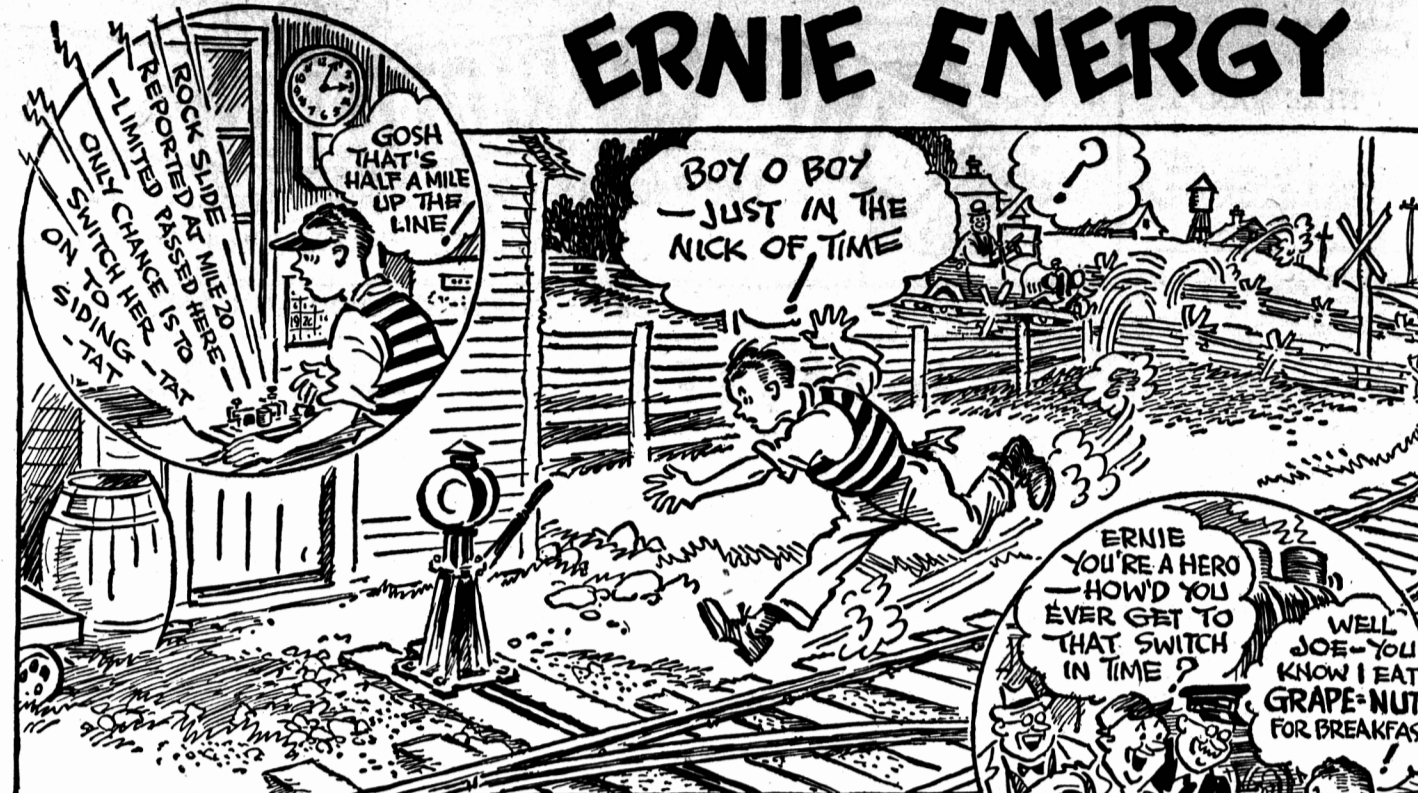

(By URSULA BLOOM)

"You had no right to come poking and prying into my things," she snarled.
"But Nelly . . ."
Suddenly, before he was aware of it, they had precipitated themselves into a row, a great enormous row. He challenged her with the frocks and the dance ticket torn in two. At first she lit, coldly scornful at him, but, pushed into a corner, she told him the truth. She was sick of quietness, and of living a silly life out of which you got nothing. Dick had been taking her about. Oh, at first there had been nothing in it, nothing but all. Nothing. Then she had found that she was fond of him. She did not know what had started it, how it had happened, but it had happened. And now she supposed she was in love with him. She couldn't help it. Mistakes might happen with anybody. Mistakes! She heard the word half choking him.
He did not know what he did then. He had some intangible memory of going out into the night; of crashing into one of the little boats that are round Custom House steps. Of drowning his misery, and hearing the wake next morning with a sour taste in his mouth, a sore head and the uncomfortable knowledge that he was up for Captain's defaulters.
That finished the chance of promotion.
Perhaps he did not care. Anyway he thought he didn't. He went to see Nell the next moment that he could, and he thought before he got there that he would argue with her, but you could not argue. She was packing.
"I'm going back to Portsmouth," she said.
"Nell, that's the best thing you can do. Malta is a wicked little island. Things happen here. People lose their mental balance. They don't realise what is happening. Go home, and I'll come to you later."
Only when he had seen her off in the Knight of Malta, when he had scraped together the money for her fare, and had started her on the way, only then did he discover that Dick's destroyer had turned for home as well.
Then that was why she had gone! He had climbed back into his own ship, and he knew that he was drunk. His mates had tried to quieten him, they did not want him to get into trouble again, and they had been kindly and well-intentioned, only it hadn't helped. He wanted a row. He felt that with the gross injustice of life, a good row would help him, and he did not know why.
That was the final straw to promotion.
At the end of two and a half years he went to China. He did not care. Nell had written from Portsmouth, and she accepted his allowance week by week; she did not ask more. Well, she had feathered her nest all right. He supposed that Dick was a constant visitor at the house, supposed that Dick was doing well out of it. The dirty scum! Yet even feeling that way he did not care.
"They called him 'Hell-fire Jim' these days, just because he cared for so little. He was drinking too much too. Well, when you were young and forgot. When you lay in your hammock swinging gently with the ship, you could dream rather sweetly of the little breeze with the soft gold curls, tip-toeing beside him.
"In the last two years he heard nothing from her.
"And now it was perhaps the last straw that he was returning to Portsmouth, and as he passed down the narrow water way, past the fort, with Southsea a long green stretch on the right, he should meet the old ship, which there had been all the trouble, being towed out to the breaker's yard.
"Ship of memory, ship of dreams, ship whereon he had met her, ship wherefrom he had left her.
"They shouldn't break up old ships, he was telling himself, "something more than iron and steel in her, something far more, something like a heart that beats within her."
He saluted her grimly as she passed him by. It gave him a certain sense of satisfaction.
"Only to-day he had been seen by the paper that Dick had got promotion. A warrant officer! Well, who'd have thought it? Shows what you can do by sticking up to your seniors. Shows that your private life doesn't matter two bits. Dirty scum! And he himself had promotion passed by, had had his chance and lost it, and did not care. He cared about nothing now.

Clyde River Players Present Good Comedy

The Clyde River Hall was filled to capacity last Tuesday evening when the three act comedy, "That's One On Bill," was presented by the Young People's Society.
Mr. John A. Murray presided as chairman.
The play was under the skilful coaching of Mrs. Arthur Roper.
The players deserve much credit for the excellent manner in which they carried out their parts. The acting throughout was cleverly done, with a smoothness and expression that delighted the audience.
Specialties between acts added much to the enjoyment of the performance. They included readings by Miss Dorothy Walker, and vocal solos by Mrs. Arthur Roper, all of which were enthusiastically enjoyed.
Mr. William Murchison was the accompanist for Mrs. Roper.
The play told the story of Bill Hally objecting to the efforts of his wealthy and youthful Uncle Jimmie to mate him with Mab, a sweet but quiet girl whom Uncle Jimmie has selected for a niece-in-law. "The Uncle has promised to leave part of his fortune to Bill if he will marry as instructed, and part of it to a prize-fighter Battling Bennie B-zo, if Bennie remains unmarried.
Bill's sister Lil, seeks to have her brother marry Mab as the uncle desires, and plots to make him tired of his romantic desire for a motion picture bride. So Lil gets her school friend, Patricia, to visit their home in the guise of a motion picture star, and Patricia loses little time in ensnaring the hearts of all for her.
"But Nell."
She turned to him, "There's a little home waiting, you know, and a wife, and a kiddie."
Somehow he could not believe it. He could not believe that here he was sitting on Southsea common, and that she was by his side, and the child pushing the pram before them was his own. He didn't deserve such luck.
He said, "Oh, Nell, it's unbelievable."
But his eyes were set on the far heat haze, on the dim outline, where between fort and lighthouse that faint greyish speck was resolving into nothingness.
Life is strange.
THE END.

Islander Honored

At the recent closing exercises of the University of Saskatchewan at Saskatoon, the degree of LL.D. was conferred on M. F. Hedley Auld, Deputy Minister of Agriculture for the Province of Saskatchewan, in recognition of his services in the interests of agriculture during the past years.
Address to Mr. Auld
In presenting Mr. Auld to Sir Frederick Haultain, chancellor of the university, President Murray said:
"Twice before has this university sought to honor distinguished representatives of agriculture. The first was Mr. Angus McKay who discovered the most suitable method of tillage for the Prairies, the second, the Hon. W. R. Motherwell, who had been most active in advancing the interests of agriculture through governmental policies and now the university wishes to do honor to one whose services have been in the field of administration where clear vision, sound policies, tact and above all, integrity, are of fundamental importance. Mr. Auld's services have been rendered in times of unparalleled difficulty when problems of relief have been almost overwhelming.
"We are not unmindful of the service which Mr. Auld rendered to this university, when director of agricultural extension and later when co-ordinating the work of the university with that of the department.
"Dr. Auld was born in Covehead, P.E.I., educated at P. W. C. and went West in 1892. Robert C. Auld Freeborn, is a brother, also Dr. Fred M. Auld for sixteen years Medical Missionary to China, now practising at Nelson, B.C. Dr. S. Auld in the Government employ at Regina, and a sister, Dorothy, wife of Rev. D. S. Dix, Ph. D. professor in the University at Saskatoon.

Easterner Named for Indian Study

NEW HAVEN, Conn., July 6—(C.P.)—Dr. Murray B. Emeneau, native of Lunenburg, N.S., who is Research Assistant in the Yale Department of Linguistics, is completing a year's study of the Dravidian and Munda languages in India. He will continue his work next year, the university announces.
Dr. Emeneau, whose research this year was sponsored by the American Council of Learned Societies, has been studying several of the Dravidian dialects. The Dravidian languages are spoken by some 60,000,000 people and the Munda languages, the other non-Indo-European group of languages in India, are spoken by 3,000,000. Neither of these language groups has been described adequately nor are there satisfactory comparative grammars for them.
Dr. Emeneau this year devoted his research to the Toda language, a Dravidian dialect, which is today spoken by only a few hundred people and is verging on extinction. He has worked out a preliminary grammar of the language and its phonology and has also made several ethnological studies of the tribes speaking this language, a study which includes the marriage customs and an analysis of the figures used in various decorations.
