ELLEN'S DIARY

A Gentle Breeze Lifted The Wash Being Spread

"Busy — am I busy?" Mama Starling echoed from her terrace this morning. Then broke into a chuckle. "What a superfluous question!" she said. "Yes, yes" she nodded to a nestling eager to take off from her door. "Wait... I'm coming! Did you hear that? Then make your own deduction" she smiled.

"This is a lovely morning" the younger farmer offered in a greeting from across the yard. It was indeed. Morning — cool, with the zephyr of breeze from up the creek lifting gently the pieces of wash as we spread them. It was scented with the June — time fragrances: aroma of ferned woods' paths, and furry places, and wild flowerings, overlaid with the delectable lilac smell. "M-m-h!" the one girl of the farm, choosing a bouquet for her room smiled, inhaling with obvious delight the prevailing fragrance. "Catch that scent! There is no sweeter smell than that of lilacs, is there?" she queried.

"No, none" we agreed. "There's the narcissi" she remarked on a second thought. "But we get that only lightly. It is not so marked as that of lilacs."

"And there's the laurel willow, and the linden, the chestnut and acacia — all those scatter a rich perfume, when in flower."

The cooked rice must be dry and flaky, so the grains will separate when tossed with the dressing and other salad ingredients.

WALKING BEATS TRAIN

GLASGOW (CP) — Charles McNally, a 19-year-old cook, found that it was quicker to walk than ride the train when he paid a visit to his parents here. He sent his suitcase on ahead by rail and then walked the 400 miles. A week after his arrival, the suitcase had still not been delivered.

MARY HAWORTH

Wife Wants To Help Mate Bear Life In Pentagon

Dear Mary Haworth: I am married to a great man, a brilliant, high ranking officer. He is having great difficulty adjusting to the Pentagon.

If I weren't sincerely worried I never would be so disloyal to my husband's branch of the service as to bring this out in the open. The problem isn't peculiar to him. It is so common, indeed, that it might be called the Pentagon syndrome.

I know that the personnel people there are aware of the situation and doubtless are trying to do something about it.

Some of us service wives are married to men who just aren't "staff officer" types. And too many of these men are leaving the military service and going into civilian jobs, to escape being tied to desks.

I realize, of course, that the really great man is one who can adjust to anything. Maybe the discipline of staying with a distasteful job is part of an officer's training; but doesn't every great man (or even the average individual) have some quirks?

I favor the positive view. I want to know how I can help, rather than "curse the darkness." What can I do, more than just try to make home life as pleasant as possible?

My husband is a superb officer. For years strangers have introduced themselves to me simply to say "Your husband is the finest commander I've ever known." I think he's the greatest person that ever lived and I want him to be more contented. Please give us the benefit of your wise advice. T.R.

DEAR T.R.: It is probably an error in perspective to allude to your husband's problem (of frustration, I take it) as symptomatic of "the Pentagon Syndrome."

More likely, his symptoms relate to "career syndrome" in general: a type of affliction, marked by great unrest and tension, that tends to fester across the whole top bracket of masculine competitive drive for eminence and authority in the "power world" of politics, government, business and industry.

In short, the Pentagon, where your husband suffers from his particular sense of stalemate, and of being a square peg plugging into a round hole, is but one of a great many anthills of centrifugal human activity to be found on the landscape of this old planet Earth, in this century.

As to how you can make a helpful contribution in the circumstances: You can encourage your husband to weigh his career alternatives, inside the Pentagon and outside, search his soul for guidance and then choose the opportunity that promises to yield most peace of heart, in terms of permitting him to be more fully himself, not simply a slave of ambition, while applying himself usefully to the life-of-his-times.

I don't subscribe to your speculation that a really great man is one who can adjust to anything. Rather I think a really great person stands for certain positive things, immovably; with trumpet-like clarity, unto death, if necessary. It is the chameleon, a type of lizard, that is the rudimentary form of life, that changes colors for survival's sake when apprehensive.

Thus I see no virtue, per se, in staying with a distasteful job just for the sake of the discipline involved, if other avenues of growth are accessible, that would permit a freer, more fruitful, more congenial exercise of one's potentials in the service-of-life. M.H.
