BEATNIKS IN FRANCE HIT BY CRACKDOWN

PARIS (AP) — "Simply shocking," said the young Englishman. "It's an abridgment of our persons' freedom."
 He had long, tangled blond curls and a gold ring in his left ear and he was talking about the current French police crackdown on beatniks.
 "If this keeps up I'll probably go to Spain," he said, crossing one sandalled foot over the other.
 The French have decided that long-haired, moneyless, jobless and untidy visitors are not welcome to live La Vie de Boheme in France.

 A government announcement this week said foreigners answering to this description would be stopped at the frontiers.
 The first known victim of this policy was a 20-year-old University of Edinburgh student who was turned back at Calais. He had long hair, a guitar and about $24 in his jeans.
 Members of the international beatnik community here say police started showing their unfriendliness a month ago.
 "I get stopped about three times a day," said a young American. "They check your passport, ask what you're doing here and then let you go."
 "A buddy of mine was taken to the police station the other day. They let him go after four hours. No explanation."
 "The police have no trouble spotting 'Les beatniks.' For the most part they wear a standard uniform—sandals or white tennis shoes, khaki pants, an army surplus parka and a canvas bag for their possessions. Socks and guitar are optional.
