

Ellen's Diary

some that had been thoughtless, yet were adventurous and daring. And "God keep them!" we said. From the fighting fronts came back tales of their bravery, their self-sacrifice for others, their comradeship and love.

These we shall speak of to remember — the valiant dead. They whose names are written goldenly on granite memorials in city squares, in church yards, at country cross-roads. Youngsters we have known, who never had a chance to grow up — whose faces and forms grew "not old" in the minds of their loved ones, still bereaved. In mind we shall see these on this Day of Remembrance, and wish James as we linger over our breakfast, feeling that it would be sacrilege to hurry to the work of our hands on a day like this, we shall name many a name. Touching incidents of the assembling we shall speak of . . . of a lad of the district, a volunteer of World War I who must ride part of the way home with a parent just by way of "going a piece" though it meant a long walk back to join his comrades-in-arms in the city, all to entrain in the morning on the way over-seas. His name is on the monument in the school-yard, beside the river road.

We shall see the white of the crosses against the green of those far-away places where the clay is not altogether foreign to us, but in spots is forever island-red, rich and beloved in its dust. The memory of these of the war-years we shall perpetually honor; the gallant lads who returned to pick up again as best they could the round of every-day living and those who remained to sleep last sleeps far
