ELLEN'S DIARY

Mailman Come Today With A Horse And Wagon

"Here's good luck for you all day!" we smiled to Alex, picking up a four-leaf talisman of clover and tucking it in his tiny breast-pocket this morning when we were on our way to lane's end for the mail.

"Oh!" he echoed "good luck all day!" And forgot it, at least for the time, as he pattered bare-foot and most pleasantly through this and that puddle on the way. We chuckled. But—"Oh dear!" we recalled frowning in the young years when we discovered one of our small ones we had clad in clean garments only moments before seated in the horse-trough by the pump in the yard, splashing and enjoying himself with mud abundant there. And an old friend present twinkled "Don't you know children are like ducks? If there's a puddle or a bit of water near, they're going to find it. And don't fuss over the wet clothing. It will dry. Be thankful that trough wasn't full!"

Sometimes now we lose the mailman to a smart car or a busy little truck which bears him on his round, but this morning he chose to travel after his habit of bygone summers—by horse and wagon. To note his passing is to forget for a moment the accelerated pace of these times, the fret and fuss and haste of a bustling world, and retrace our course through the years, back to more leisurely days.

What countless tons of mail he has carried to his patrons through his long years of service—the printed words of the newspapers, from loved ones and friends away from home. And, we chuckle, the bills? Perhaps. But by and large the mailman bears to folks that which makes his coming welcome and altogether a nice event of the day.

Morning showers were ours at Alderlea today—electricity gathered through the recent heat to a dark and mystic thunderhead above the trees. And spent presently.

The evening? How summer-lovely it is here on the verandah. Fragrant with night-flowering scents and at Alderlea always.
