Hunting Pressure Should Cull Animal Population

By THE CANADIAN PRESS

Alberta game officials checking on the take of big game in the province this season are also helping hunters to find their quarry.

Check points established in hunting areas are playing a part as information booths where hunters can learn of likely game haunts and road and hunting conditions.

Provincial authorities hope that hunters will become better acquainted with game officers and learn more of the need for conservation. They emphasize too that information furnished by hunters at check points while on their way home may help solve big game management problems.

REGULATION NECESSARY

John Stelfox, government game biologist, said Alberta should be harvesting a greater number of big game animals than now is the case.

Hunting pressure on deer, elk and moose should be regulated so that herds are culled periodically to keep the animal population from increasing.

Mr. Stelfox said the population thins out without shooting when poor food causes the health of animals to deteriorate. But when there is lack of good food, he said, undesirable vegetation begins to develop on the range and it can never support as large a population as it did before.

The big game season opened in the province Nov. 1 and it is expected a record 30,000 hunters will take the field before it closes Dec. 31. Hunters have a wider choice of game than they had in 1954 when only 8,000 licences were sold.

NOW LEGAL GAME

Deer and moose are legal game in specified areas after being protected since 1952 and the area where "either sex" elk hunting is allowed is larger this year than last.

Good stocks of deer and elk have been reported and mule deer are increasing in numbers.

D. E. Forslund, superintendent of game for the province, said it is impossible to compare the over-all hunting yield with last year's. He said it will not be known until local distributors report at the end of the season how many licences were sold.

Supervision is also more extensive than in the past. Hunters have been asked to leave the lower jaw of the animals they bag at check points so scientists can obtain information on the survival of young, age composition of herds, incidence of diseases and other facts.
