THE TELEPHONE SYSTEM. A Small Army is Required to Keep it in Order and Operate it. When we come to lines and central offices the complication is simply beyond description.

The telephone cables underground in Boston represent an outlay of $1,000,000. These cables are laid in New York over a million dollars, and the man who talks from Boston to Chicago sends his voice vibrating over a line that for the copper wire alone cost $150,000.

Every subscriber must have a switch, not only opposite the particular operator who answers his calls, but also opposite every other operator, for any one of them may receive calls for him.

Are many people required to keep all this in order and to operate it? A small army. Engineers and electricians to construct the apparatus, and to plan for extensions of the system; wiremen, instrument men and mechanics to build switchboards and place in position the apparatus; and operators to work the switchboards. In fact, a veritable army of employes made up of regiments trained in the different branches of the work.—New York Commercial.
