CHILD INSURANCE.

The friends of the bill prohibiting insurance on the lives of children under ten years of age, which has been introduced in the Massachusetts Legislature for the purpose of admitting a mass of convincing testimony at the hearing in the State House at Boston.

This week, Mrs. Lucy P. Atwood, of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, has been the most prominent witness. She said, among other things, that no less than 125,000 children under ten years of age were insured in the John Hancock Companies alone.

She said that the most painful instances where parents, after taking out policies on their children, deprived them of food in order to save money to pay the premiums, the children sometimes literally dying of starvation. One lady had paid fifty-five cents a week for eight years, but had failed in her payment, and lost $230.

Mrs. Atwood had observed that on the days the insurance premium is paid the children in the family go hungry. She gave an experience of her own quite recently, when she found the children of a family suffering for food, and one of them explained, "This is the morning that we have to pay the insurance money to the insurance man for our burial when we die, so we can't spend it for breakfast."

The Rev. Albert E. George, of St. Matthew's church, South Boston, said that the insurance companies were insuring the lives of children who were regarded as an encumbrance. He promised to prove that in one instance at least, an undertaking and insurance agent had divided profits after the death of a child.

Richard H. Cana, whose standing made him an exceptionally trustworthy witness, said there was no truth in the claim of the companies that they do not seek insurance in the slums. Their canvassers go wherever there is a prospect of making a dollar at the death of his child is to him an enormous sum, larger than any he ever saw, and it affords great temptation for desiring the death of the child.

A STATESMAN'S MISTAKES.

According to Sir Herbert Maxwell, Lord Randolph Churchill, after resigning the chancellorship of the exchequer, made no secret among his friends of his confident belief that he would be in office again in a few weeks. But he had never cultivated a certain faculty of intercourse which, at this juncture of his career, would have stood him in good stead, and of which his neglect was the more remarkable because he had been so long in office.

His party leader on whom he modelled his own career, Disraeli was a consummate master of suavity and consideration toward his followers. Churchill was notoriously careless in his relations with his subordinates, and even with rudeness, to those with whom he had been on cordial terms the day before.

His indifference to the rank and file of his party cost him the support of the intimate friends had sown the seeds of resentment which ripened into a formidable aggregate of hostile feelings after he had divested himself of power. Men who had been confident in, and proud of his ability as a leader, found that when their faith in him was shattered, there was no faint of warmer feelings to fall back upon. He was feared rather than loved by the party.

Had it been otherwise, had Churchill gained half the hold on the affections of the House which his immeasurably less brilliant colleague W. H. Smith, secured—one of two things must have happened; either he must have returned speedily to office or the unionist party must have split into two camps.

A STIFF WAR.

The New York Commercial Advertiser seems to think that the foreign complications in which the United States has foolishly permitted itself to become involved have been brought about by the meddling of the public. It is correct, but at the same time the country has nothing to blame in the matter but itself, or rather, perhaps, the actions of unscrupulous politicians. The people do not desire any of this meddling in external affairs, but then the administration is not responsible to the people and they cannot help themselves.

The Commercial Advertiser adds that "in this chaotic state of affairs a stiff war would not be wholly unwelcome." The writer who has indulged in this wicked sentiment is evidently a person to whom war is a matter of theory only and not of practice. He is writing of complications with France, Germany and Great Britain, to say nothing of lesser nationalities. How far New York, Boston or other coast cities would "welcome" a war which would bring the shells from the fleets of any great power into their streets and also exact heavy tribute, is a question not dealt with by the Bombastes of the Advertiser. Apparently there was never a time when there was greater sympathy for the people of the United States to weigh carefully the wise words of Washington, in his valdatory letter, in which he enjoins his countrymen to avoid every thing that would bring the shells from the fleets of any great power into their streets and also exact heavy tribute, is a question not dealt with by the Bombastes of the Advertiser.

JOHN NEWSON. mch19-1m dw

A COMPLETE TRAGEDY.

The Wilna papers report a shocking drama enacted in that city a few days ago, says the London News. A man who, as a youth, had emigrated to the United States many years ago, and there amassed a considerable fortune, returned a fortnight back. His appearance was so much changed that his old neighbors, with one exception, failed to recognize their youthful acquaintance. The exception was an old friend of the family, who was leaving Wilna on a short absence by a departing train just as the young man alighted. Finding himself unrecognized, the young man spent a few days lingering about his old haunts and picking up information of his father and sister, the latter a very pretty girl when her brother had left as a mere child.

One evening he went to his father's house during the latter's absence. His sister was greatly attracted by the strange guest who had so many interesting experiences to relate. And they supped together. The brother, feeling fatigued, begged to be allowed to remain over night, as he had something of importance to say to the girl's father in the morning. His request, though somewhat surprised at his sister, though somewhat surprised at his request, consented, and prepared his sleeping apartment. On her father's late return the girl informed him of his unexpected guest, and dilated, unfortunately, on the stranger's wealth. The old man's cupiditas was aroused, and during the night he stole into the guest's bedroom, and murdered him in his sleep with an axe.

During the next day the old neighbor now returned, who had recognized the young man's rooming station, came with a number of friends in a news of their emigrant relatives in the States. "Where is your son?" he inquired of the murderer. "Your son?" asked the latter with a blank face. "Your own boy," said the neighbor, "who returned some days ago, and has made a fortune. Did he not sleep here last night?" Suddenly the horrible truth flashed upon the unhappy father, who rushed to the scullery, where his son's body was hidden. He is now in prison, but it is said his reason is shaken.

ON BAD HANDWRITING.

(From Harper's Young People.)

One of the most important things for boys or girls to learn to do is to write plainly, so that those who have to read what they write are left in no doubt as to their meaning. Several amusing stories have been told of men who, in the course of their business, have been obliged to address a letter to the General Court of Massachusetts upon some subject of great interest at that time. When the letter was received by the Clerk, the clerk read it, and was filled with wrath at what appeared to be these words in opening: "Address you not as magistrate, but as Indian devil."

"What?" he cried. "Read that over again. How does he address us?" "Not as magistrates, but as Indian devils," repeated the clerk. "That's what he says."

The letter was passed around, and the judges were by no means pleased to see that the clerk had apparently made no mistake. Very angry at what they believed to be an insult, the judges passed a vote of censure upon the clerk, and wrote to him demanding an apology. He came before them in person, when it turned out that where the judges had read "Indian devil" he had written "individual," which, of course, made an apology unnecessary; but the reverend gentleman was admonished to improve his handwriting if he wished to keep out of trouble.
