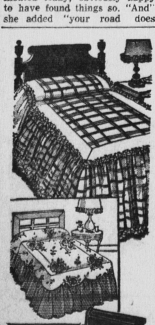
The Mare And Filly Have Many Admirers

"We saw the stream and the mill. And this is the old house... and there is the house across the lane!" a visitor from a far Island community commented today, obviously happy to have found things so. "And" she added "your road does run up by the house on the hill!"



What nice visitors have come by Alderlea this summer, all extremely interesting to the folks of this farm. Each has his or her distinctive story, a chapter of which we may read. Each has some endearing trait, maybe one unconsciously revealed, for us to file away in memory, where so many lovely items collected up the years now remain.

Varied are the works, the pastimes and hobbies of those who come by. Those from busy city or town always find a charm in the peace of the fields. Farmers are naturally interested in the crops and the stock: the cow - kind and the calves that browse on the pastures. The mare and the filly also have their admirers. The sows too that laze, not without some anticipation now of weeborn piglets to come. Some enjoy the kittens that play in the barns, and the three bantams, two so handsomely speckled with plumed tails, and the dear demure hen. Children like these, and the fluffy-coated, white rabbit, Alex's property and care. Many find a mutual interest in the trees and flowerings about... It is interesting for us to note that if the later supposedly belong in womens' realm, it is not unusual to hear those of the sterner sex also express their admiration over some flowerings, particulary those which "my mother" or "my grandmother" was wont to grow.

Only ordinary, of course this place is, from the fields to the kittens and rabbit, but all are important components of this farm - life and farming of ours.

Sun, we had today, and a pleasant coolness for those whose work lay in the fields: in the potato - lands it might be, gathering up that crop which, by virtue of sun and shower and dew, had now come up to the digging: to be of much assistance to the farmwife in making up her menus and an often surprising cash-crop to the farmer, who grew them.

Today blessed too those who harvested with binders. Or were busy, as were ours, at
