BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

(By Thornton W. Burgess)

BLACKY REMEMBERS HE IS HUNGRY

Blest is he who to be fed
Earns himself his daily bread.
—Old Mother Nature

There is nothing quite equal to hunger for sharpening wits. This is true with all the Green Forest and Green folk, little and big. The smarter they are the better they live. And there is nothing like having to work for what one has to give one the feeling of independence. Old Mother Nature's law is each for himself. The only welfare amongst her children is the welfare of independence. Those who will not work for their food starve.

Blacky the Crow is one of the smartest of all the Green Forest folk, but smart as he is he has to work for all he gets. It is just so with Reddy Fox. No one brings him food. When he awakes in the morning there is no breakfast waiting for him as there is for boys and girls and most grown-ups. They must work for their breakfast, hunt for it, and hunting for something hard to find can be work of the hardest kind.

Blacky had been hungry when he started out this morning. Now he had forgotten all about it and all because of Reddy Fox. Yes, sir, Blacky was so interested in what he was watching from the top of a tall tree that he had forgotten all about breakfast. From where he was perched Blacky could look all over a big old pasture much grown to bushes and briars and tangled brambles in the middle. It was a place beloved of Rabbit folk. They had cut little paths all through it. Until now they had been safe from Dogs and Foxes and all the feathered hunters big enough to catch Rabbits. And because Dogs refused to go in there to drive out those Rabbits had been quite safe from hunters with dreadful guns.

"Caw, caw, caw!" he called and went to look for a belated breakfast.

CALCULATED RISKS

It is not always advisable to "play safe" at bridge; in this game, as in all others, "calculated risks" are vital. For example:
