CHAPTER EIGHT PRINZ MAKES EXCUSES

Doctor Rutter sat on the edge of his bunk drinking tea and scowling at Prinz, who shuffled uncomfortably in one of the chairs and looked exceedingly worried.

seemed best. I cleared all traces as swiftly and efficiently as possible.

Rutter nodded his head. "And threw the body over the side. What story have you to account for the disappearance?"

"Circumstances assisted us," said Prinz, a little more sure of himself on this point. "The jerk alarmed most of the passengers. Lacoste noticed a few of them crowded together at the top of one of the companionways. True, they did not venture across the deck. Perhaps Litwin was more daring. And, in the fog, he may have gone too near the side."

"No," said Rutter. "Accidents of that nature don't happen while a ship is practically still on the water. Had he been by the rail at the time of the jolt—that would have been a very different matter."

"I suppose it was too calm," said Prinz ruefully. Then he looked up with a smile. "I have it!" he cried. "Litwin must have lost his head. He felt that the ship was sinking and so he took a jump over the side. After all, there is no accounting for what crazy things some of these people will do."

"That may be better," said Rutter grudgingly. "These wretched creatures are little better than half-crazed animals. It might have even been suicide. The shock on top of depression. The miserable influence of the fog. Those are possibilities. The best thing that you can do is to have an investigation. Ask a great number of questions, and take plenty of notes. That will impress everybody. Remember—you do not know the truth—and have little personal interest."

Prinz nodded his head. "I will arrange an official inquiry without delay," he said.

"We are now in a difficult position," Rutter told him. "I don't quite follow," said Prinz. Rutter snapped his fingers impatiently. "You never do follow," he complained. "That is the trouble with you. How do you think we can perform the operation now?"

Prinz moistened his lips. This was a question which he had been dreading. He had not been able to think up a new scheme.

"I know that it presents difficulties," he said slowly. "So far I have been too occupied restoring calm among the passengers to be able to devote much time to it. But I feel that it will be possible for us to overcome the obstacles. It is not as though we are without subjects for the operation. We have lost one—but there are plenty more."

"And how shall you explain a second disappearance?" Rutter asked bitingly.

Prinz looked even more uncomfortable. "We shall have to make very careful plans," he said.

"You talk about planning," cried Rutter impatiently. "The truth of the matter is that you haven't any ideas in your head!"

Montague Rebekahs, Oddfellows Hold Hallowe'en Party

The Montague Rebekahs and Oddfellows and their guests enjoyed a delightful Hallowe'en party in their Lodge, Thursday evening, at the close of the regular meeting of Acme Rebekah Lodge number 67.

An excellent program was prepared by Mrs. Atwood MacDonald and Mrs. Neil Hooley and included games and contests.

Three teams tied for the first prize in the first contest, "Place names of P. E. I." They were Mrs. C. A. Shaw and Sgt. Lewis Watson, Mrs. Byron Stewart and Harry Higginbotham, and Mrs. E. H. Stewart and Mrs. Colin MacDonald.

The second contest "Hidden Names" was won by Mrs. Ellie Llewellyn.

The prizes for the best costumes for the ladies was won by Mrs. A. Shaw, and for the gentlemen was won by Mr. C. A. Shaw.

The judges were Harry Higginbotham and E. H. Stewart.

A great deal of merriment was caused when the judges were "at-lacked" by the "disappointed" contestants.

During the lunch hour baked beans, steamed brown bread and pumpkin pie were served. After a few remarks by Miss Thelma Larter, Noble Grand of Acme, she called on Sgt. Lewis Watson, R. C. M. P. who with Mrs. Watson is renewing old acquaintances in Montague and vicinity.

Sgt. Watson spoke briefly expressing his pleasure at being able to be present and meeting so many old friends. Mr. E. H. Stewart then addressed the group bringing a thought-provoking message on ways and means of aiding community projects.

A number of old favourites were then sung, with Mrs. Atwood MacDonald as pianist.

A very enjoyable social was brought to a close with the singing of "Auld Lang Syne."

Oh! bless abode where sorrow's tears ne'er flow.

Borothy Dix Says—

killed everything that was fine in him and pulled him down to her own level.

I have known innumerable men whose wives' influence was so great over them that they separated them entirely from the mothers who bore them and the sisters and brothers they loved. The reason a bridegroom's family is always in tears at his wedding is because they know that John's marriage ceremony may be his funeral ceremony just as far as they are concerned, and that they may be losing him just as much as if they were laying him in his grave.

HER ATTITUDE SETS RELATIONSHIP

Everything will depend upon his wife's attitude and whether or not she wants him to be friends with his people. Otherwise she will break off the relationship. How any man can have his mind poisoned against the mother whose devotion and tenderness he had known all his life; how any man can be separated from the brothers and sisters whose loyalty and help have never failed him, only the devil knows, but he has taught the secret to every jealous wife and she can turn the trick.

In the common, everyday affairs of life it is the wives who influence their husbands, not the husbands who influence their wives. It is the wives who decide where the family shall live and in what style; whether they shall be savers or spenders; whether they shall try to keep up with the Joneses or live according to their income; what church they shall go to; what schools the children shall attend, etcetera. Husband has precious little say-so in the domestic circle.

It is women who start to make over their husbands according to their little paper patterns as soon as they are married. Men seldom attempt the job of changing their wives. Perhaps it is because men know that it makes for peace and happiness to take a wife "as is", instead of trying to change her. Maybe it is because they know that it can't be done, and so do not wear themselves out attempting a hopeless task.

But, at any rate, it is a fact that wives influence their husbands far more than husbands influence their wives. No man, for instance, can alienate his wife from her own people. She will love them still and cling to them, no matter how much he dislikes them. No big man can make a little woman see life from his point of view. No intelligence of a husband can cure a fool woman of her folly. As she was born and reared a woman stays, and her husband can no more change her than he can the shape and quality of the Rock of Gibraltar.
