

MISCELLANEOUS.

AN UNDESIRABLE APPARITION. At a town in the west of England was held a club of twenty-four people, which assembled once a week to drink punch, smoke tobacco, and talk politics.

ABOUT MIDNIGHT, the time, by long prescription, appropriated for the walking of spectres, the door opened, and the form in white, of the dying, or rather of the dead man, walked into the room, and took his seat on the accustomed chair; where he remained for some time, and then he disappeared.

IT IS NECESSARY to say that such a story spread over the country, and found credit in the minds of the ignorant, for, in all reason was superfluous when opposed to a plain fact asserted by three-and-twenty witnesses.

ONE OF THE CLUB was an apothecary. In the course of his practice he was called to an old woman whose profession was attending sick persons. She told him that she could leave her world with a quiet conscience but for one thing which lay on her mind.

"DO YOU remember Mr.—, whose ghost has been so much talked about?" she said. "The night he died I was in the room for something I wanted; I am sure I had not been absent long, but as my return I had not without my patient."

WHEN you begin to scold, let her have it out. Put your foot coolly over the tender—lock back your chair—and let the storm rage on. Saying nothing.
