Opening lead—four of hearts. In notrump contracts there is frequently a race between the declarer and the defenders for the establishment of tricks. The time factor is an important element in the race, as is shown by this hand where South became declarer at three notrump.

West led a heart and South won the jack with the queen. Declarer entered dummy with a spade and led the jack of diamonds, hoping to lose the trick to West—who would not then be able to continue safely with hearts.

But East went up with the ace to foil this plan, and returned the eight of hearts. West's heart suit thus became established before South could set up his diamonds, and the end result was that South went down one. The defense had won the race against time.

However, South should have made the contract. He should have realized that the chief danger of losing the contract consisted of West's having five hearts and an entry in diamonds that would make it possible for him to cash his long hearts.

Having made this determination on the first trick, he should have ducked the jack of hearts when East played it. This would not in any way stop him from winning two heart tricks eventually, since he would still have the Q-10 left to deal with West's king.

But the duck would have had an all-important bearing on the hand. South would have made four notrump instead of going down one. The best that East can do after winning the heart is return a heart.

Declarer wins the return in his own hand or dummy's, depending on what West plays, and then attacks diamonds. If East wins the first diamond, he does not have a heart to return, thanks to the holdup play, and South eventually makes ten tricks.

If West wins the first diamond, the result is the same. He can set up his hearts, but does not have an entry left to cash them. Either way, South wins the race against time.
