Antiquities and Customs

By F. H. MacArthur

Barns, or the granaries of Palestine, were caves in the limestone rocks, entered by an opening in the ground, carefully concealed by a stone covered with soda. This was done to hide the place from Arab robbers. (Jud. VI. 10). Such caves may still be seen in use on the hill of Jerguel. Barns such as these existed in Egypt in Joseph's time, and in Palestine in that of our Saviour (Luke xii, 18).

Hebrew books were written upon the skins of animals but in Egypt on papyrus. At first, the lines extended the whole length of the skin, but subsequently the parchment was cut into strips and divided into pages. The writing appeared only on one side. Each end was fastened to a roller, with handles attached.

The book commenced on the right hand. As the reader read, he unrolled the scroll. This was called "a roll of a book," and each book of the Bible formed a separate roll, which, when not in use, was carefully put away in a metal cylinder.

Armour was used in Saul's day. Goliath wore a bronze helmet, a coat of mail (weighing about 100 pounds) shields of brass on his legs and a shield between his shoulders. His weapons consisted of spear, shield and sword.

Brickmaking as described in Exodus, still goes on in Egypt near Cairo where may be seen large brickyards with surrounding hills composed of the waste of centuries, where bricks are daily made of clay and mixed with straw to bind them together. Bricks have been unearthed in Egypt bearing the brand of Thothmes III, whose date is as far back as the Exodus.

Burial and cremation of the dead was practiced at a very early period, but cremation was used only for the bodies of persons who were denied religious burial. Some of these ancient cemeteries may still be seen in Machpelah, Shechem and the Valley of Jehoshaphat. Burial was refused to criminals and their bodies left as prey to birds and wild beasts.

Marriages used to be performed in the upper room of private homes. The betrothed couple stood under a canopy, the bride veiled and both wearing crowns, which were several times exchanged during the ceremony. The marriage was performed by an elder who, in the course of the ceremony, handed a cup of wine to the betrothed. When the groom drained his, he dashed the cup to the floor, crushing it with his heel, and swearing fidelity till his powdered fragments should be reunited. When the ceremony was over, friends and relatives showered the couple with rice as they frequently do in our own time. After dark, the happy bridegroom took his bride home, attended by the friends of each, while others joined the procession on its way, bearing lamps in token of respect. Upon arrival at the bridegroom's house, all were invited to a feast, which by the rich often lasted several days.

Ancient ships were steered by means of two paddles, passed through the vessel on either side of the stern. When the craft was stationary, the paddles were lashed to her sides by "bands" which were also used to secure and steady the oars when in use.
