MARY HAWORTH

Parents' Right To Rule Questioned By Reader

Dear Mary Haworth: What kind of country is this? Our parents say they believe in equal rights, but they certainly don't practise their belief at home.

They will come in when my children are watching TV and either turn it off or switch to another channel. But we would not dare do that to them.

I don't care what anybody says, children and teenagers should have the right to express their feelings. Please tell me what you think as regards these rights for young people. Yours truly, G.S.

Dear G.S When your parents speak of equal rights, they are referring to certain concepts of common decency, which acknowledge the fact that all men are brothers— all being children of the same God the father— therefore co-equally endowed with birthright title to fair fraternal treatment in human society.

Or, in another sense, they are referring to the moral truism that all adult citizens of the nation, of whatever race, creed or economic condition, are entitled, by virtue of being persons, share in the duties, responsibilities, opportunities and rewards of rightful citizen endeavor.

"Your parents aren't talking about anarchy, a state of society in which there is no law or supreme power; a state of confusion and disorder in which "anything goes."

Order is heaven's first law, we are told. And in a well ordered household, children don't exercise co-equal rights with parents, on the score of ruling with authority.

In the family, parents are lawgivers, as part- and- parcel of their duty and responsibility to guide, protect, nurture, instruct and safeguard their children from harm, insofar as they can. And rightly reared children (during dependency years) are courteously responsive to the parents' right to rule.

Of course some parents have nicer manners and a more prudent judgment than other parents have in the exercise of authority. Perhaps your parents fall short on that score.

But in any case, in the nature of things, children aren't co-equal with their parents, in family councils that regulate family behavior.

As to the rights of children to express their feelings, I think in general it is distinctly more wholesome just to know (for yourself) what you feel, rather than to give expression to all that you feel.

What separates the men from the boys is the capacity to feel one's feelings, inwardly, while also keeping them under control.

ELLEN'S DIARY

Gentle Sonwfalls Make December Charming Time

There was south in the wind, and sunshine, today, to let any wishful farmers get on with the plowing.

"A few hours more, and we'll have ours straightened away" the younger farmer reported this evening...

We remember that December is here by this, a loved month indeed of the year. The best! Spiritually, we think, in that it commemorates a momentous birth.

December is undeniably it brings. Frosts with their diamond - glints on the white, changing a drab countrys ide into a fairyland of place. Ice for laddies' skates, it gives... Christmas with its carols and lights: myriads of them brightening country and city, which to see loosens taut, selfish, skeptical heartstrings, representative as they are of so much that is good.

MAGIC VISIT

To the children these mean Santa Claus — Saint Nickolas, the dear friend of young'uns, who stirs young anticipations. What will he bring in his magic visit on the Eve? A doll to a maid to mother? Skates to a lad, precious shining things with the new bright on them?... But also young, they lisp the Christmas story. And enthralled, they stand before a creche touching softly, reverently, the figures it includes, marvelling over the Babe in the lowly manger-cradle, obviously altogether touched by the scene.

December is first of all the Christmas month. But it gives too, adding to its charms, the winter solstice, that shortest day of the year, which is warrant of increased daylight ahead. It promises that light will come. The longest day will dawn, dewy and lovely, when little scented winds will play in the haylands, in new meadows where the clovers grow. Roses will be in bud or full open opening, spilling their colors, smiling, perfect...No dropped petals then to remind one of time's passing, as when they fall! Orchards will blossom then — and brides be adorned.

"CAN'T HOLD HIM"

"How enchanting the June time is," we shall say. Yet know that each month, every season, hath its own charm: in flowerings, in harvest-gold, in autumn's flames, in the scent of the hearthfires and the coziness of the home.

The warmed wind re-called the cattle - kind, to the pastures today and the horses as well, to range the fields and again to drink at the millstream.

"I can catch one—but I can't hold him!" Peter, the small one of the house across the lane, confided when we came with him to a piggery today to look at the piglets of this fall's bornings: the all-white of the Yorkshires, and those banded or dotted with tan, which declares a crossing of breeds. And all so attractive now, roguish and playful and cute.

Neither, it comes to mind, can we hold these days-precious ones of the Old Year's giving, so busy and good!

Until Tomorrow — Diary — Good-night.....
