Another big achievement from one little Brownie which took much determination. Work was so far ahead that we completed the Recruit Test for Twenties in record time and Twenties, Lioma Smith, Aline Corcoran, Helen McKinnon, Elise Live, Naomi Willis and Irene Parkman were enrolled as Brownies. With the help of Miss McDonald (teacher) we made an improvised Toadstool and each Brownie made her Promise in the usual way and was enrolled by Mrs. Jenkins. ## Stage Star Of Generation Ago Dies In Calif.

SANTA MONICA, Calif., June 24 (AP)—Jane Cowl, once Broadway's most famous "Juliet," died Thursday of abdominal cancer at 65.

One of the most beautiful women of the stage in her era, Miss Cowl had recently scored movie success as a character actress.

She starred in a score or more of Broadway hits and also was the author or co-author of nine plays. She helped write two of her most famous starring roles—those in "Lilac Time" and "Smilin' Through."

"Within The Law" in 1912 probably was her greatest popular hit, but she always liked "Romeo and Juliet" best.

She played her Juliet for a run of 856 nights and matinees, a Shakespearean record on Broadway. That run began Jan. 24, 1923. Her identification with the "Juliet" character was so well known that to this day, many American school textbooks of the bard's plays still carry her picture in the part.

She was born in Boston, but New York was her home from the time she was three.

She was the widow of Adolph Klauer, for many years the drama critic of the New York Times. To earn money, she wrote a feature story about David Warfield, noted actor. She took it to the Times, sold the story and later married the editor who bought it.

After his death, she lived quietly with her secretary in a New York hotel and spent much of her time reading. She never married again. They had no children. A close friend said she had no living relatives.

Ellen's Diary

had decided "Perhaps we'd better go in and help Rob finish us," there was presently an out-going by truck to what, especially for granddaughters, has been a very nice day. Very beautiful this one was, which lies close to the end of the Spring-time, how tenderly the blue sky held the fleecy white clouds to its bosom! How prettily now the farm-homes sit tree-framed among their meadows. How beautiful the trees on the lines, and what a picture the herds against the woodlands on their "green pastures"! How mystic the distances where a dim landscape held other farmsteads on a carpet that was spread towards the horizon! Close to Rob's instead of the cold dark windings, or the brittle sun-flecked one of a Winter's day, it was a bewitching ribbon of silver that sparkled away happily beneath the bridges. "Everything about the country is so pretty at this time of year—the fields and trees and woodlands." Karolyn commented, looking up from her work to take in the spread scene.

On a grassy spot in the lee of the pump-house there, where the farmers had spread the sacks of potatoes for our convenience, we were busy cutting seed. The farmers were at the planting and hilling. "It looks easy, Ellen, but I'm telling you that the hilling is one mean chore of the cropping! I ache in every bone of my body when I've finished it!" The children, granddaughters and the younger son of the house there, who carries a fine and varied collection in his overall pockets, were about the yards, happy in their play and Jamie had not yet come from his classes. All in all it has been a day to remember—of setting-cutting and field-work, of laughing busy small fry, of handfuls of daisies, of kittens and ducks, of chicks and bird-song, of the sun and wind of June and it's full, lovely fleeting hours.

"We did very well today, Ellen, but it will take us a spell of tomorrow to finish in there," James tells us coming in through the twilight to catch a weather report. "Fine again!" he comments, "not a sign of rain about it or for that matter in the sky either. Then, "Did you notice, Ellen, what happened while we were away?" Ay, we have our trusted barometer back again—the millpond, whereon for us the impending changes of weather are written, and spent of late weeks for the convenience of the bridge-builders, is rising towards it's Summer level... and at Alderlea for farmers and housewives all's well again! Until tomorrow — Diary — Good-night....

More Rain Needed In Prairie Provinces

WINNIPEG, Man., June 24

Rains over the greater part of Manitoba and the eastern part of Saskatchewan have resulted in a fairly ample supply of moisture in the western part of Saskatchewan and south and central Alberta. However, rain is urgently required to prevent severe deterioration of the growing crops and reduce the grasshopper menace which now threatens due to the poor pasture conditions caused by lack of moisture.

Some farmers in southern Alberta expect to sell a portion of their beef cattle to conserve feed for dairy cattle, according to the weekly crop report of the Department of Agriculture of the Canadian National Railways.

In the Okanagan valley weather during the past week has been warm. The first good rain occurred last Thursday night. The BC tree fruits have completed survey and set loss to industry on account of the severity of the past winter, at over $8,400,000. Damage to peaches is now set at 96 per cent, cherries 90 percent, apricots 90 percent, plums 60 percent, pears 70 percent, apples 40 percent and apples 20 percent.
