TO DRAIN NEW ORLEANS.

The commission which has charge of the task of providing for the disposition of the surface drainage of New Orleans has decided to use electric power for pumping away the enormous quantities of rainwater which it has to deal with, and a contract for an electric outfit for the central power house and for three pumping stations has just been made with the General Electric company of Schenectady, N. Y. A great part of the city of New Orleans lies below the mean level of the Mississippi river and only a little above the level of Lake Pontchartrain, and when rains fall the little flow that can be got naturally is not enough to keep the city from being flooded. In ordinary show the usual fall is an inch of water an hour, and in heavy showers this amount runs up to 5½ inches. In order to gather this and get rid of it the New Orleans drainage commission is having two long canals dug from the low parts of the city to the other side of the Metairie ridge, which lies about midway between the river and Lake Pontchartrain. A pumping station will be established at the head of each of these canals to lift the water into other artificial ways, whence it can run off into the lake.

One of these canals is above and the other below Bayou St. John, which reaches into the heart of the city from Lake Pontchartrain. The one below will be divided into two parts, and at Broad and St. Louis streets, where their different levels meet, a third pumping station will be established to lift the water from the lower to the upper level. This station will be known as No. 2, and it will lift the water three feet. The other stations, numbered respectively 6 and 7, will be at the ends of the canals and will each lift the water ten feet. The pumps at station 2 will be able to raise 500 cubic feet of water three feet every second. Those at each of the other stations must raise 800 cubic feet of water ten feet every second.

The whole system is to be supplied with power and operated from a central station situated at the Florida avenue crossing of the N. O. and N. E. railroad. Here will be the big dynamos. Of these there will be three, of 1,000 horsepower each, one of 500 horsepower and two of 100 horsepower each. The object in dividing the power in this way is to enable the engineers to throw in whatever amount of power may be needed to clear the canals of water in accordance with the severity of the rains.

Multiphase, high tension dynamos and motors will be used. The current will go out at 3,300 volts and reach the motors at the pumping stations at 3,000 volts. Two separate sets of wires will reach to the pumping stations to guard against breakdowns. The nearest pumping station will be No. 2. That will be 15,000 feet away. The next will be 7, 18,000 feet away, and 6 will be 26,000 feet from the power house. Station 2 will have two pump motors of 125 horsepower each and one of 40 horsepower, and each of the other stations will have three motors of 450 horsepower each.
 Instead of using ordinary pumps the water is to be raised by whirling screws just like the propeller screw of a steamship. For the big stations each of these screws will be about 12 feet in diameter and will make 62½ revolutions a minute. The screws will work in a pit and their shafts stand vertical. The motors will be attached directly to the upper end of these shafts and revolve horizontally. It is intended eventually to build and equip five other pumping stations when the drainage canal system is fully developed.—New York Sun.

AN UNPARDONABLE CRIME.

"W-w-what d-do you want?"
 The speaker is Mr. John Doem, the Klondike coal merchant, and his inquiry is addressed to the stern faced man at his bedside who has just awakened him from a pleasant dream.

"I want ye," is the blunt reply, "and you'd better hustle into yer clothes, or my friends who are waiting outside will get impatient!"
 There is something in the tone of the stranger, to say nothing of the suggestive way in which he handles his six shooter, that discourages further questioning. So as quickly as his shaken nerves will allow the coal merchant dresses himself and follows the visitor down stairs. When he emerges into the street, his fears are redoubled. By the faint gray light of the dawn he perceives that a large crowd has surrounded his house, and, to judge from the fierce yells with which they greet his appearance, their errand is not exactly a peaceable one.

But the vendor of black diamonds has little time for speculation. In the twinkling of an eye he is seized, tightly bound and dragged to a nearby tree. Then as the ringleader comes forward with a rope the shuddering captive recognizes him as a customer of the day before.

"Mercy!" he implores, but the leader's only reply is a snarl of rage. In desperation the terrified man appeals to the crowd.
 "Gentlemen," he cries, the tears rolling down his cheeks, "surely you ain't a-goin to take a feller citizen's life without givin him a chance to say a word fer hisself. My weights has all bin tested by the government, and if they happen to be short—which I truly hope they ain't—why, it's no fault of mine."
 "It is not only a question of short weight," rejoins the leader savagely. "Had you confined your cheating to that we might have overlooked it. But no mercy can be shown a man who adulterates his coal with nuggets painted black."—New York Journal.
