Thoughts For Our Time

By His Eminence Cardinal McGuigan

CHRISTIAN BURDENS

There once lived a man named Simon. We may well imagine him as a good sort of fellow, probably not too unlike many of our own neighbors—perhaps even like ourselves in many ways. Honest and industrious he was—a man with a certain dignity and independence, giving trouble to no man, and asking in return only to be left alone in security and peace. Not exactly an adventurous soul, Simon—rather the steady type who liked his sacred little comforts, pipe and daily paper. Not a coward, you understand, nor overly selfish—only asking that he not be bothered or irritated by other, less thoughtful souls.

And then, one momentous day, our friend Simon made an amazing, revolutionary discovery. Unexpectedly he met trouble, humiliation, suffering—met them face to face, and found in them a joy, a strong, virile peace which he had never known before. Yes, we know this Simon of Cyrene, know him well. We meet him each time we read through the account of the Passion of Christ. We meet him there as he is forced to carry the cross behind Christ—a condemned man on his way to execution. We meet him there as he learns the great truth that—"Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted."

"Blessed are they that mourn . . . The man Simon, we may believe, learned the secret of these words. They teach that he is thrice happy who does not seek immunity and invulnerability to pain and sorrow above all else. Happy indeed are they who through love of God and man is God, do not run away from the troubles of others—who are not afraid to "stick out their necks." To love is to make oneself vulnerable, to open oneself out to the beloved, not to close in around oneself. The happiness promised to those who mourn belongs to the Christian pre-eminently, as follower of a crucified Master.

The Christian by the very grace of his vocation aspires to a life of love which, of its nature, must often thrust personal convenience aside. Because he loves with the love of charity, he is open to attack from all sides. Any determination to avoid completely trouble, anxiety, sorrow, any desire to live one's own life in a completely impossible to a man who tries seriously to love God with his whole heart and mind and strength, and his neighbor as himself. There is no escape from sorrow, but there is transformation of sorrow through the redeeming love of Christ.

We Christians have laid ourselves open for trouble, we have entered the ranks of those who mourn. Yet it is within our power to defeat the logic and the meaning of our position, to give the lie to the promise of Our Lord by our selfish unwillingness to fulfill our call, by a refusal to read through the account of the Passion of Christ. We meet him there as he is forced to carry the cross behind Christ—a condemned man on his way to execution. We meet him there as he learns the great truth that—"Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted."

It is possible to make a science of avoiding trouble and discomfort—a science of escaping the irritations and worries which are attracted and nourished by the generosity of charity. We can do much to guarantee a certain amount of ease and hollow peace, but in so doing we reject that true comfort and joy which can come only from the Cross of Christ. St. Paul has made this point abundantly clear, "The sufferings of Christ, it is true, overflow into our lives; but there is overflowing comfort, too, which Christ brings to us."

To realize our vocation as Christians it is imperative that we absorb the truth which we have seen take hold of Simon—that this world cannot give that peace which is found in carrying the burden of the Cross after Christ.
