Tomorrow's Promise

By Temple Bailey

As she leaped out into the night, Jerry made a flying leap from the sill into the stout old vine of Virginia creeper that covered the wall. He swung himself down, mewing as he went. Then as he reached the ground he swept in leaps and bounds towards the meadow.

Anne said her prayers, got into bed and lay there thinking of all that had happened since that dreadful moment in the garden. The room was almost as bright as day and the light showed her green taffeta billowing over the back of a chair, her pearls heaped in their silken whiteness on the dresser. She reflected that it was well Vicky was not there to see. Vicky's sense of order would have been outraged by the room's aspect, and she had so often warned Anne about letting the pearls lie about. They were lovely pearls and had been left to Anne by her father's mother.

She fell asleep at last, to be waked by the sound of laughter and voices in the hall. Her mother was saying, "Try my rights tomorrow, Lucien." Then the sound of the Dorsays' car and shouted farewells. It was all very gay and a bit boisterous.

There was a long silence, then through the still house stole the tinkle of the old piano and her mother's voice, muted:

"To say what long you've known is true,

I love but one alone, and 'tis you."

Anne looked at the clock on her little table. Two o'clock. It seemed strange that her mother should be singing there so late alone. She got out of bed and went into the hall. The music had stopped. Something drew her on until at last she reached the first landing of the stairway. From there she could see straight into the library. And from the landing she saw her mother standing on the hearth with David. And David's arms around her mother!

Anne never knew how she got to Vicky's room. "Vicky, he kissed her! He kissed my mother!"

"My dear, my dear..."

Whispering, whispering, Anne told the things she had heard in the garden. "They said that David was in love with—Mother—and that she loved him. And that if Daddy found it out, it would be the end of her."

Vicky said, "I must go down, Anne. If your father should come..." She did not finish her sentence.

but Anne knew. It was like a nightmare to lie there and watch Vicky getting into her clothes, hurrying, hurrying. And all the time the beast of the garden seemed to be crouching in the room.

It seemed a long time after Vicky had left the room that there came through the open window the sound of David's step on the gravel of the driveway. He always walked home across the fields.

She got up, looked out and watched him striding along and out of sight. But still Vicky did not come. After a while Anne caught the sound of her father's motor in the distance. A little later he came into the house and she heard voices. His and her mother's and Vicky's. She did not know what was being said, and she dared not go down, so once more she curled up in Vicky's bed and waited.

And when Vicky came, she pulled the chain of the lamp and waited.

"Yes?"

"You'd better run along to your room, darling. We'll talk things over in the morning."

"I want to talk about them now, Vicky."

Vicky came and stood by the bed. Her face was white and there was a frightened look in her eyes.

Anne said, "Is it as bad as that?"

And Vicky, said, "It is very bad, but we must try to make it better."

Something of it all she told Anne, but there was much she did not tell her.

Going downstairs, she had stopped on the landing and had called, "Does anybody smell smoke?"

There had been dead silence for a moment, then Elinor had appeared on the threshold of the library.

"It's the logs in the fireplace of course, Vicky." Her voice held a touch of asperity.

Vicky, looking down at her, said, "I was afraid."

Elinor did not answer and Vicky, descending the stairs and seeing David in front of the fire, murmured an apology. "I was afraid," she repeated. "Things happen so unexpectedly."

So ingenious was her manner, so quick her words that David, taking her intrusion at its surface aspect, said, "Perhaps I'd better go with you." He followed her down the hall to the kitchen and back to the library. Then he said, "Everything seems to be all right, Elinor, and I must be going along."

SHOULD LEARN HOUSEKEEPING

Also, marriage is a very complicated business. Before going into it a girl should learn how to cook and market and be a good housekeeper. That takes time and experience. It takes experience with men to know how to handle a husband and get along with his people and make friends for him. That also takes time. And it takes time for a girl to get over her childishness and to learn how to be reasonable and philosophic about things. So, you see, it is folly for a girl to jump into matrimony before she is ready for it.

Furthermore, I think that every girl in the world, rich or poor, should learn some profession or trade by which she can support herself and she should practice it for at least a year before she marries. I do not think there is any other such a preparation for marriage as for a girl to have worked in a business office. No girl who has ever earned her own money is wasteful of her husband's and no woman who has ever come home at night so worn out that all she wanted to do was to slump down and be fed and not speak ever nags her husband because he doesn't want to go out at night.

DEAR MISS DIX: We have a daughter of 13 who thinks that she has a right to do anything and everything she pleases. We have always given her everything our modest income would allow. She has had good times, nice clothes, spending money, and we have always made her friends welcome to our house. But we find out that she is lying to us about what she does; that she meets boys on a street corner when she has gone to see a girl. She never brings her boy friends to the house and she represents us to her young friends as tyrants because we try to keep some control over her. Is a child of 13 capable of deciding every question for herself? Is a girl of 13 too young to start going out with boys? A HEARTSICK MOTHER

ANSWER: If there is anybody on earth who is in a hot spot and deserves the prayers and sympathy of the community, it is the mother of an adolescent girl. She has to deal with abysmal ignorance that believes itself inspired wisdom, with utter lack of experience that considers itself sophistication, with a full determination to have its own way and with a selfish disregard of the feelings of others that would make a stone image seem mushy with sentiment.

And the poor mother's hands are tied because she does not know whether to drive with a loose rein and take the chances on the girl running wild, straight to destruction, or to hold a tight rein over her and take the chances of her jumping the fence and wrecking her life in its very beginning.

All I can suggest to the mother is to walk warily and try to keep her daughter as much under her eye as she can. Induce her to bring her friends to the house so that you can see the crowd she is running with. Thirteen is, of course, much too young for her to begin to go out with boys except in the most casual way, but if she is boy-crazy nothing you can do or say will stop her.

Don't make scenes with her. Don't pick on her. Don't be forever throwing her youth, which she hates and resents, up to her. Assume that she is grown and that you are appealing to an adult mind and sometimes you can get her to use a little intelligence.

DEAR MISS DIX: Considering that I am a poor young man, paying for land, will it be all right for me to marry the girl I love without giving her a diamond and to have a very simple wedding? JOHN ANSWER: Not only eminently proper, but in good taste. A diamond ring is not necessary to make a marriage legal and binding. In fact, more marriages stick without diamonds than do with them.

DOROTHY DIX cannot personally reply to readers, but will answer letters of general interest through her column.
