

Speculate Wreck May Be That Of Explorer's Ship

TOBERMORY, Ont. (CP)— Examination of a 40-foot keel and some ship's ribs found in a lonely cove on a Georgian bay island has started speculation the wreckage may be that of the Griffon, first ship to sail the upper Great Lakes.

Built at Niagara by the French explorer de la Salle in the summer of 1679, the Griffon on her first voyage picked up a cargo of furs at Green Bay, Wis., sailed out into the lake and vanished.

The Georgian wreck was found in 1900 by Orrie Vale, Tobermory commercial fisherman. He kept his find secret more than half a century.

Historians and archaeologists say they have found some evidence the wreckage is old and that the workmanship is similar to that of the French era.

However, Roy F. Fleming of Ottawa, considered an expert on the Griffon, said he doubts the link between the wreckage he discovered in 1930 at the western end of Manitoulin island.

Samples of the iron work from the Manitoulin wreck were sent to the French national laboratory. French authorities expressed the view they were from the Griffon, this of the woodwork were identified by other experts as white oak from the Niagara region.

FOUND SKELETONS

Six skeletons were found in a cave near the spot on Manitoulin. "Actually there have been 12 Griffons found already, from as far south as the Detroit river up to Lake Michigan," Mr. Fleming said.

John MacLean, Toronto Telegram reporter, wrote Tuesday that he first heard of the Vale find two years ago when he met Vale while doing a shipping story. Vale showed him two pieces of wood from a ship he said was extremely old.

Last month Vale told him more about the wreck. Early this month MacLean and Vale examined the wreckage in shallow water in the sheltered cove on an island between Tobermory, at the tip of the Bruce peninsula, and Manitoulin island. The exact location of the island is being kept secret.

The wrecked ship was flat-bottomed, as was the Griffon. It had no centre-board and the hand-hammered spikes in the white oak keel were coated with a black, tar-like, inflammable substance. Drawings showed workmen beside a smoking pitch pot.

Canadian Teachers Agree To Establish College

OTTAWA, (CP)—The Canadian Teachers' Federation decided Monday it is desirable and feasible to establish a Canadian College of Teachers, a professional organization similar to the College of Physicians and Surgeons.

The 74,000-member Federation made the decision at its 34th annual convention here in accepting the principle of such a college. It said establishment of a college would give teachers professional recognition which they do not now enjoy.

The 40 delegates attending the convention agreed that members of such a college would be recognized as good teachers by provincial governments, which have jurisdiction over education in Canada.

NO DEFINITE DECISION

However, delegates did not make a definite decision that a Canadian College of Teachers should be established immediately. They decided to ask provincial affiliates for their views and to consider the proposal

The meeting was then adjourned after which a lively auction sale took place, with Mrs. Michael Murphy as Auctioneer and realized a sum of $11.00.

again at the 1956 convention. Establishment of the college was recommended by a special committee, which reported such a college could be set up without interfering with the right of provincial governments to certify teachers.

Under the committee's recommendations standards for membership in the college would be high.

ALLOW FOR EXPERIENCE

The committee recognized that a number of teachers without university degrees are making a major contribution to Canada's educational system. Provision would be made to enable such individuals to become college members.

However, the ultimate aim of the college would be to accept only university graduates as members. The committee proposed that the college be made up of members and fellows.

Main qualifications for members would be a permanent teaching certificate, a university degree or acceptable alternative, and at least seven years' teaching experience. Fellows would be required to be members of the college for two years, have a post-graduate degree and pass an oral examination.

The audio-visual committee of the federation said a report is being prepared on the results of recent experimental school tele-

WATERS OF COMFORT

Nearby a busy highway. A shelter'd spot I know. Where, when my heart is troubled, I dearly love to go. A pool of quiet water. Fringed 'round by whispering reeds; There, resting on its margin, The noisy world recedes. At times, along life's highway, Weary, and full of care, We seek the pools of quietness And find that God is there. Singing, we journey onward, Refreshed in heart and brain; God's little pools of quietness Have made us strong again. —Grace Curle

The 10 year switch: from playing house to keeping house

And what will it mean to you, besides buying a wedding present?

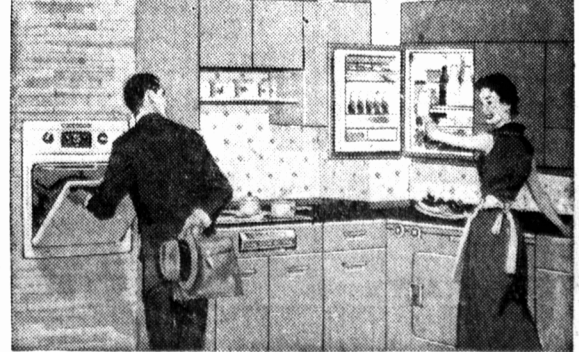

SURE, some of the neighbourhood kids you see playing house these days will be keeping house in about ten years. When that time comes and you've wished them a happy marriage, and given them that shiny new electric kettle, or some such gift, they'll be settling down in a quite different world from the one all of us now know.

The next ten years will bring significant changes—affecting our modes of living as well as the pattern of Canada's economy. One way to get a picture of this country ten years from now is to look back at the past ten years. New products and services have appeared—whole new industries have come into being—television is one dramatic example. When today's children grow up and marry there will be a lot more people—millions more in fact—with hundreds of thousands of new homes to accommodate them. More people will be needed to supply the goods and services they require. This will create many more jobs bringing more purchasing power to more people.

The use of electricity has nearly doubled in the past ten years. By the time our young couple move into their first home, the nation's power requirements will again have doubled. This country, with the exception of Norway, is the world's largest per capita user of electricity. Canadian imagination and enterprise that have done so much in the past will still further develop our natural resources, and find new ways to improve our manufacturing, transportation and communication facilities.

Far-sighted men in power companies from coast to coast are constantly planning to meet the ever-growing demand for electricity.

Today, just as it has for over 60 years, Canadian General Electric is continuing the steady expansion of its engineering and manufacturing facilities . . . helping to supply the vast amount of equipment needed for our increasing power requirements and providing new and improved products to put it to use in industry and the home.

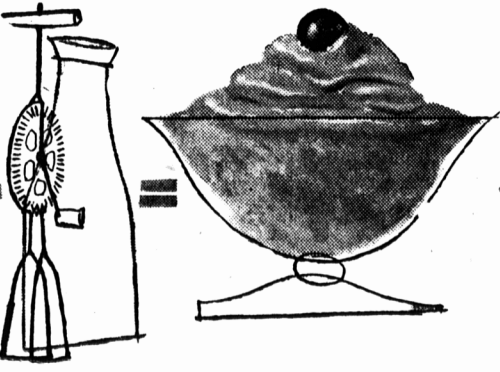

New appliances such as the wall refrigerator-freezer, the built-in range, and the combination washer-dryer will shortly be on the market. They exemplify the constant progress taking place in the development of new and improved General Electric products for the generation, distribution and use of electric power.
