THE POND.

Once on a time a certain man was found
That had a pond of water in his ground.
A fine large pond of water, fresh and clear—
Enough to serve his turn for many a year.
Yet so it was, a strange unhappy deed,
Of wanting water when the fellow's head
Was dry, he was afraid to drink
The water from that pond of his own drink.

He went to court with his fountain,
He never returned on a heavy draught;
Revising of himself, revised his rights,
"Better," quoth he, "to be half choked than quite."

Upon his pond continually intent,
In care and pain his anxious life he spent,
Consuming all his time and strength away
To make the pond still higher every day.

He worked and labored, and oh, how at it he flung,
Pounded by his pain, and took out by his gills.
In a wet season he would skip about,
Placing his buckets under every spout;
For falling showers collecting from supply,
And girdling every cloud that passed by.

Curious the dizziness of the time each hour
Although it rained as fast as it could pour;
Then the world would through every dirty spot
Whose any like moisture could be got.

And when he had no more draining of a log,
Still kept himself as dry as a hog;
And cried when folks blamed him, "what do you mean?"

It costs a world of water to be clean.
If some poor neighbor craved to slack his thirst,
"What! rob my pond? I'll see the rogue banished!"

A hounding alone these venom of the poor
Should creep unperceived thus about my door,
As if I had not frogs, and toads, and That snail my pond white er I could do.

The sun still found him, as he rose or set,
Always in quest of something that was wet;
Sometimes he rose to sweep the morning dew,
And rested late to catch the evening dew.

With snails, and toads, he labored to a rich
The frog and toad from every inch of his ditch;
With worms and pipes, and cubs and snakes,
From growing plants he drained the very juices,
Made every stick of wood upon the heaps
Of good behavior, to deposit places
By some conveyance or another, still Devised means from each declining hill,
He left, in short, for this beloved pond,
No stone unturned that could have water under.

Somebody when forced to quit his awkward toll,
And some another his will to read awhile,
Then straight he took his book, and down he sat,
To calculate the expenses he was at;
How much he suffered, at a moderate guess,
From all those who by which the pond grew less;
For as to those by which it will grow bigger,
For them he reckoned not a single figure.

He was a nice old soul, with a well maintained
That 'twas had luck to reckon what one had gained.
First for myself, my daily changes here
Cost a prodigious quantity a year.

Although thank Heaven, I never lost my mead,
Nor was I such a sinner as to sweat;
But things are come to such a pass, indeed,
We spend times the water that we need.
People are growing, with washing, cleaning, rinsing.

So failed and sick, put all concerning,
So many proud, fantastic ideas, in short,
Are introduced, that my poor pond pays for it;
Not but I could be well enough content
With what upon my own account is spent;
But those large articles from whence I reap
No kind of profit, strikes me as a heap.

What a vast deal each moment at a snip,
The even thirty mark itself dinks up;
Such a loss, not once, but I my pond provides Scarcely for its own unchangeable needs.

Nay, how can one imagine it should thrive,
So many creatures as it keeps alive,
That creep from every nook and corner, marry;
Fishing as much as even they can carry;
Then all the birds that fly along the air
Light at my pond and come in for a share;
Then at every puff of wind that blows,
Away at once the surface of it goes.

The rest in exultation to the sun—
One month's fair weather, and I am undone.
This life he led for many a year together;
Grew old and grey, in watching of the weather;
Near as death itself, all this same death
Slept as the living is, his vital sense;

For as the old fool was carrying to his field
A heavy burden that he well could wield,
He missed his footing, or somehow stumbled,
In tumbling of it by,—let it be tumbled.
Mighty destined to get out again,
He screamed and scrambled, but 'twas all in vain,
The place was grown so very deep and wide
And so in the middle of his pond he died,
What think you now, from this imperfect sketch,
My friends, of such a miserable wretch?

"Why, 'tis a wretch, we think, of your own making."
No fool can be supposed in such a taking;
You own your own folly. Nay, but warm or cool,
This pond abounds with many such a fool;
The choicest fish, the greenest toad, the eel,
Are those, which members labor to endure.
"What, for a pond?" why call it an estate,
You charge the name, but realize the fate.

Literature.

So Like a Woman.

"Do you love her, uncle?"
"I am too old to indulge in the luxury of romanticism," he said with a laugh, "but I'll tell you this, Theo, I am very fond of the girl, and very well satisfied that you'll approve of my choice!"

The speakers were Theodore Bligh and his uncle, the elder Mr. Bligh. The subject of the talk was a young girl, to whom the uncle was engaged, and to whom the nephew was a stranger. Madge Dundee, or Bonnie Dundee, as she was called.

"Well, uncle, generally submit their choices to such matters to their nephews' judgments," Theo. Bligh said, recovering his normal expression of brilliant indifference, as he spoke, and then he added: "I hope with all my heart that you'll be happy."

"You will meet her to-night at dinner," Mr.
Bligh said to Theo. "She is coming with her brothers and some friends of theirs to see her future home."

He did meet her that evening.
"I think Mr. Bligh has been rather nervous about introducing me to you," Miss Dundee said, quickly making way for Theo. to take a seat on the sofa by her side, "he's more than half afraid that you won't like me, and if you don't it will make him very unhappy."

She spoke, in a girlish, almost a childish outspoken way, without seeming to consider or to mark the effect of her words either on the man she addressed or on the bystanders. "I should have known you as Theo. anywhere,

"I had known you first," she sobbed, but I didn't, you see; and 'tis Dundee never break our word. And—oh! you had better go after all. But it was very hard to do it.
Had she not spoken his name with all her heart in her voice only a minute ago, leading him on by the tone she used to tell his secret to her, in the hope that she would be brave, and avert eventual misery from them all? And now she was telling him that if she had known him first she would have liked him best, and that she could not, for her name's sake, break her word to his uncle!

It was a ghastly state of affairs, and as soon as he could, Theo Bligh made an end of going away. The two men
