CHAPTER XIII
ANOTHER SKELETON

A medley of emotions had sped through Felice's brain as he pulled himself ashore; but terror was not one of them. He had never known fear under any circumstances, and danger only served to tighten his unflinching nerve and breed increase of caution.

In spirit he was already dispensing happiness to the hapless before his boat grounded and he made her fast and left her.

He landed, armed with an automatic and his revolver, and he carried his bag which contained the heavy mattock that might be necessary.

Rocks fell from time to time, but he knew that they would not strike him. The nets of the great spiders tangled the way, but he avoided them, and then, reaching the place of the morning's adventure, he saw no sign of the creature that he had slain.

The geyser was belching lava in a steady flow, but the only danger here appeared to be the intolerable heat. The clearing was open to the smoke above and light dimmed rapidly, but the cairn stood ten yards distant from the hot spring and though its stones burned his hands, Pardo set down his weapons, satisfied himself that no danger threatened, and attacked it.

of old lava and came away at his touch when he had freed it.

A metal box lay there some two feet long, a foot wide and two feet deep. He appraised its weight as he lifted it into his bag and guessed that it might be fifteen to twenty pounds.

His lungs were bursting and he tore off his jacket and cast away his shoes, for they began to burn his feet. Then, carrying his bag in the left hand and his lighter revolver in the other, he turned to get back to safety.

Everything had grown still and steadfast again after the tremor and the mouth of the gorge opened but ten yards distant when he stood a moment and looked down upon the skeleton of Benny East. It seemed to grin congratulations, and Felice grinned back and tried to speak. But he found his voice was gone.

crater from which streams of lava poured. The flood moved easterly and was responsible for the destruction of the fertile lands. In contrast with this ghastly scene ashore, the sea still remained calm, and it seemed that the order of nature was reversed while a dynamic earth tottered above a static ocean. Promising to return as swiftly as possible, the young men leapt ashore while Aymer spoke to the sailors. "You're quite safe here," he said. "The island's quaking, but the sea is steady. Give us twenty minutes—no more. If we are not back in that time, we shall never be coming back and you can return to the ship."
